

THE SCIOTO SCOUTS.

Am. News Co., 119 & 121 Nassau st., N. Y.

Jime Hand-Books for the Season.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

Each volume 100 12mo. pages, sent post-paid on receipt of price-ten cents each.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERIES.

DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE-For Ladies and Gentlemen; being a Guide to True Gentility and Good-Breeding, and a Complete Directory to the Usages and Observances of Society. Including entrance into Society, Conversation, etc.

DIME LADIES' LETTER-WRITER-Giving not only all the various forms of Letters of Childhood and School Days, of Love and Friendship, of Society, of Business, etc., but chapters on the art of Correspondence, on Punctuation, etc.

DITE GENTS' LETTER-WRITER -Embracing Forms, Models, Suggestions and Rules for the use of all classes, on all occasions; also a list of Improper Words and Expressions, together with their correct forms.

DIME LOVERS' CASKET-A Treatise on and Guide to Friendship, Love, Courtship and Marriage. Embracing also a complete Floral Dictionary, Language of the Handkerchief, Language of the Fan, Cane, Finger Ring, etc.

DIME BOOK OF VERSES-Comprising Verses for Valentines, Mottoes, Couplets, St. Valentine Verses, Bridal and Marriage Verses, Verses of Births and Infancy, Verses to send with Flowers, Verses of Love and Affection, etc.

DIME FORTUNE-TELLER—Comprising the art of Fortune-Telling by cards, by the lines of the Hands, by the Grounds in a Tea or Coffee Cup. how to read your Fortune in the waite of an egg, how to read Character, etc.

DIME SCHOOL SERIES—DIALOGUES No's 1 to 10. SPEAKERS, Ne's 1 to 11.
Replete with choice pieces for the School-room, the Exhibition, for Homes, etc.
The Recitations and Dialogues are fresh and good.

HOUSEKEEPERS' HAND-BOOKS.

DIME COOK BOOK-Or, the Housewife's Pocket Companion. Embodying what is most Economic, most Practical, most Excellent, with illustrations. By Mrs. M. V. Victor.

DIME RECIPE BOOK-A Companion to the Dime Cock Book. A Directory for the Parl r. Nursery. Toilet, Kitchen, Larder, etc. Valuable Patent Recipes, etc. By Mrs. M. V. Victor.

DIME HOUSEWIFE'S MANUAL Or, how to Keep House, how to Canada Renovate; how to Cut, Fit and Make Carments; how to Canada Flowers; how to care for Birds and Household Pets, etc. By The Victor.

DIME FAMILY PHYSICIAN-And Manual for the Sick Room. With Family Diseases and their Treatment; Limis on Nur-ing and Rearing, Children's Complaints, how to prepare Curatives, Rules of Health, etc.

AMUSEMENT AND INSTRUCTION.

all that a beginner can require to guide him to the entertaining mysteries of this most interesting and fascinating of games.

DIME GJUDE TO CURLING AND SKATING-A Manual for the Ice; giving all the Page of the popular game of "Curling," with Complete Diagrams; also explicit instructions for Skating, with a Guide to all the "figures."

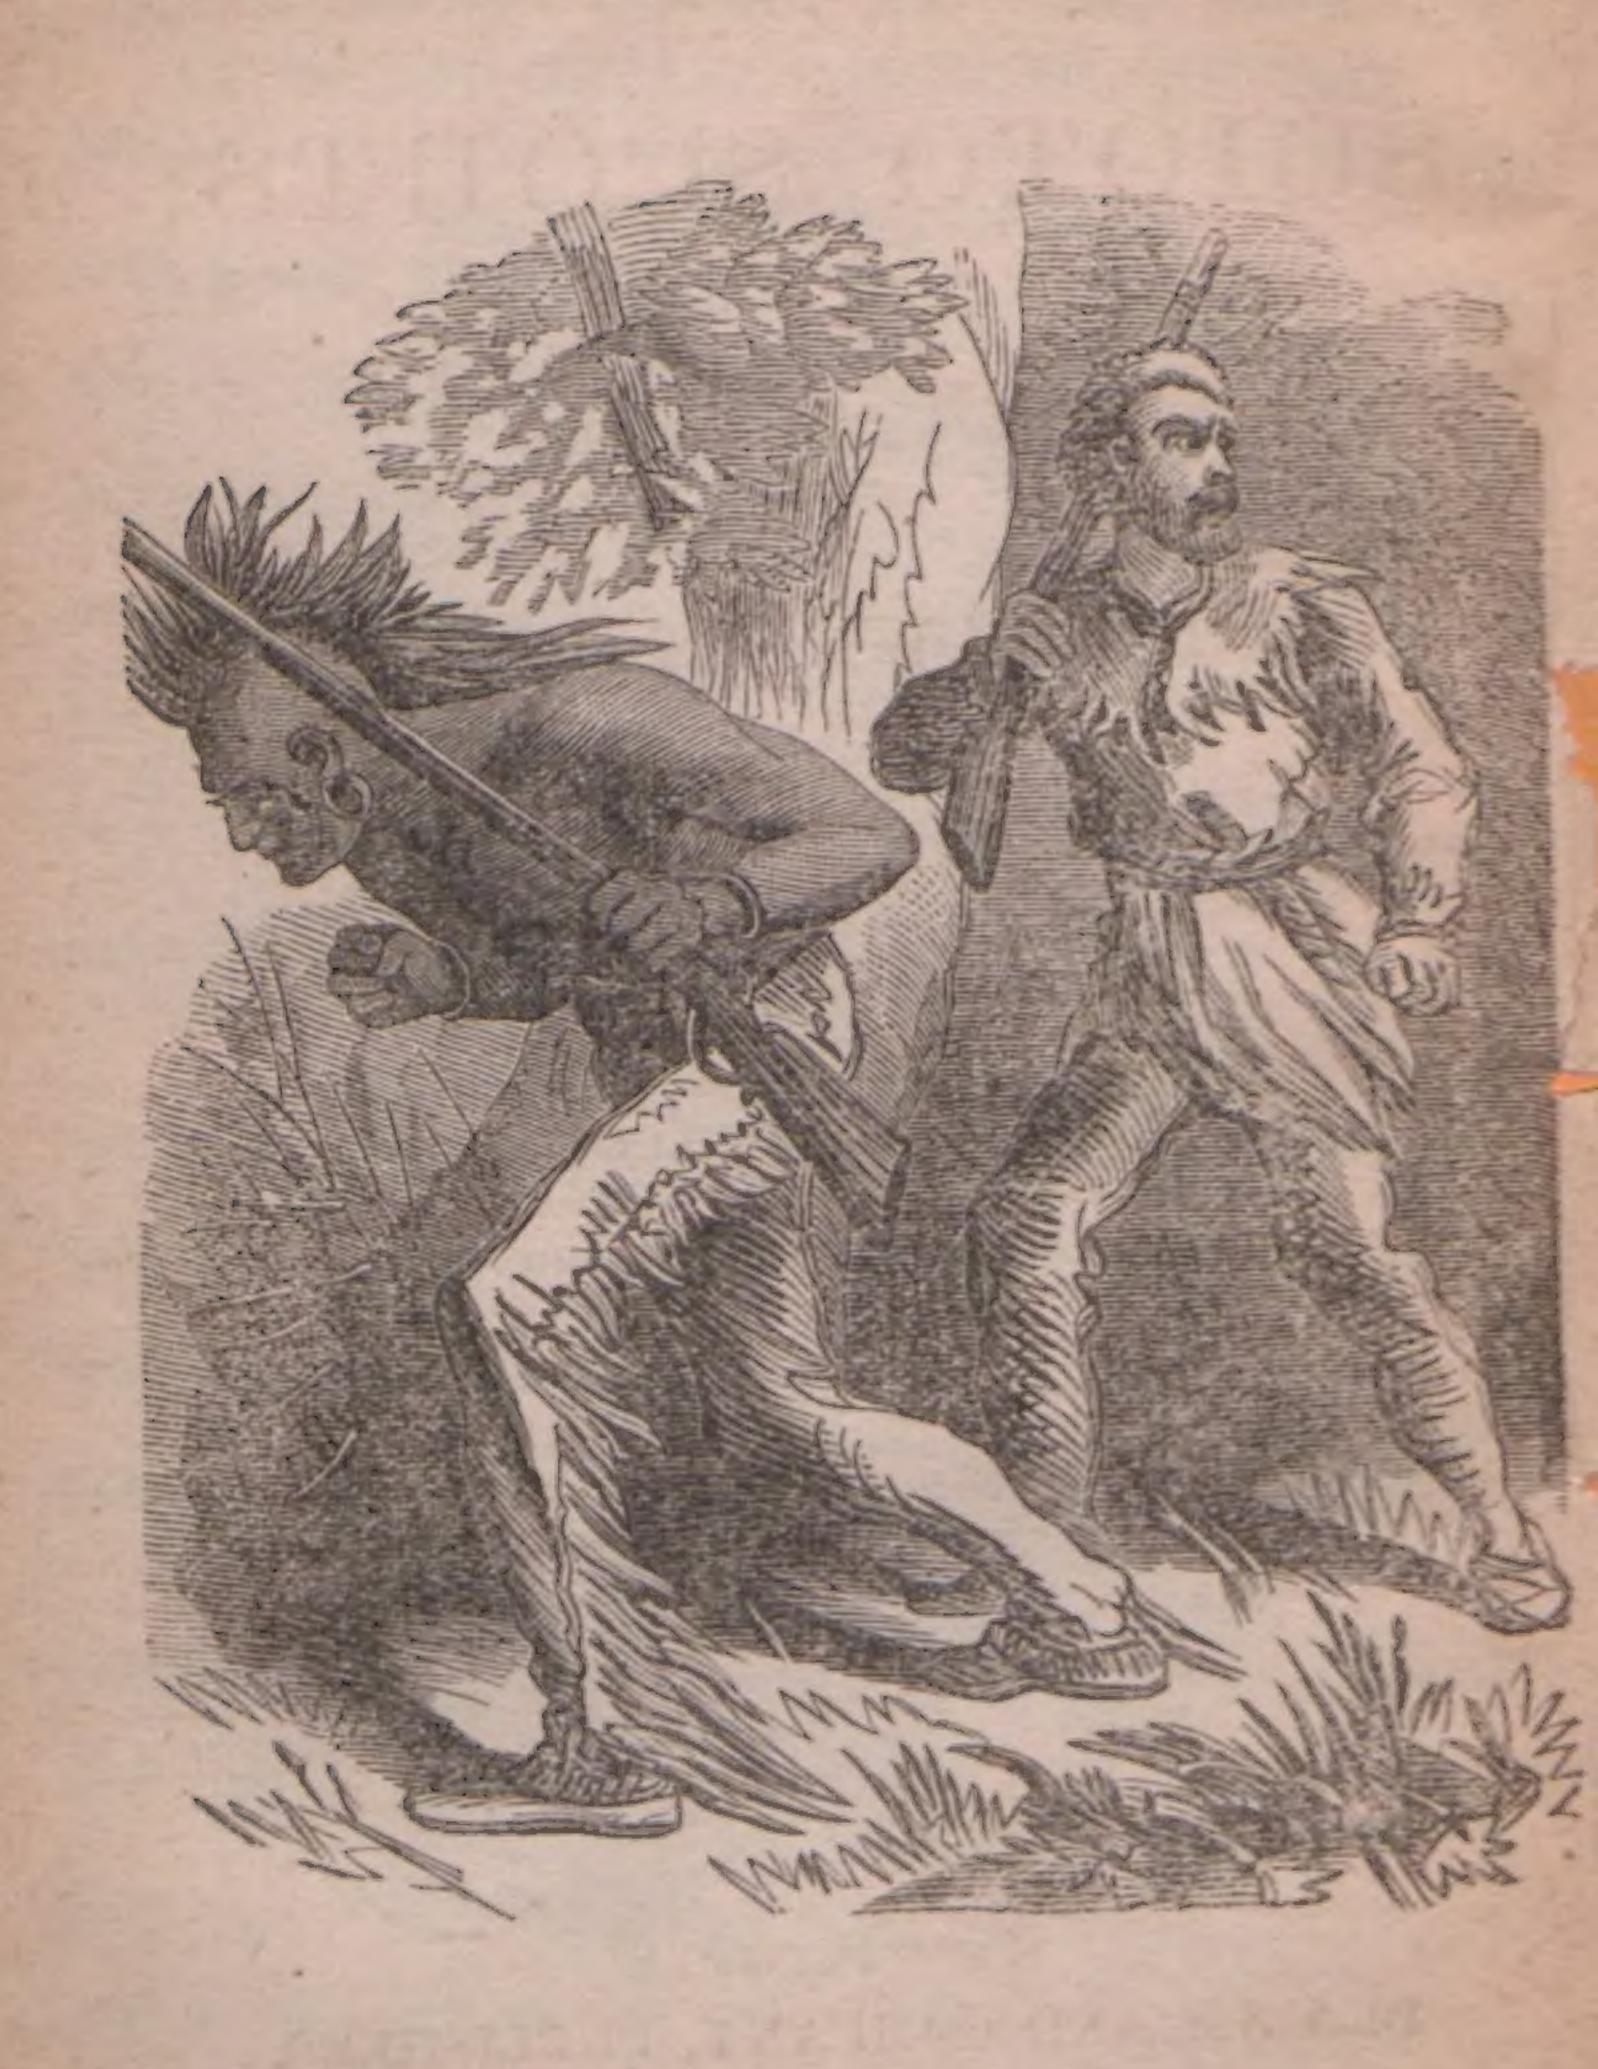

DIME BALLE AOOM COMPANION—And Guide to Dancing. Comprising rules of Etiquette, hints on Private Parties, toilettes for the Ball-room, etc. Also, a synopsis of Round and Square Dances, Dictionary of French Terms, etc.

DIME BOOK OF DREAMS-Their Romance and Mystery; with a complete interpreting Dictionary. Compiled from the most accredited sources for the "Dime Series."

DIME ROBINSON CRUSOE—In large octavo, double columns, with numerous illustrations, from original designs by Geo. G. White, comprising the text of one of the best and latest London editions.

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, locents each. Direct COMPANY

SCIOTO SCOUTS;

OR,

THE SHAWNEES' DECOY

BY EDWARD WILLETT,

Author of the following Dime Novels:

36. THE HIDDEN HOME.

11s. NED STARLING.

119. THE FIVE CHAMPIONS.

125. THE RUNTED LIFE.

132. OLD HONESTY.

139 THE BORDER FOES.

145. THE MOUNTAINEER.

149, THE HUNTER'S PLEDGE

159. SNOW-BIRD.

170. BORDER AVENGERS.

187. THE OUTLAWS PLOT.

205. THE GRAY SCALP.

PEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS,

88 WILLIAM STREET.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1870, by BEADLE AND COMPANY, In the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Wasnington.

BURNER OF BURNER OF THE BURNER

(No. 219.)

THE SCIOTO SCOUTS.

CHAPTER I.

THE SCOUTS.

THE miracle of spring had been wrought, and the forest had arrayed itself in its garniture of green. The buds that had swelled in March and burst in April, were now bunches of full-grown foliage, heavy, waxy, fresh and fragrant. Birds were singing in every tree, bright flowers were springing into bloom on all sides, and the broad Ohio was filled from bank to bank with a maddy flood that turbulently hastened to find its way to the distant ocean.

It was impossible for the eye to penetrate far into the forest, so dense was the mass of dark green foliage that obstructed the vision. Equally impossible was it for any individual who would use proper caution, to be heard as he stepped easily upon the damp leaves of last year's growth that covered the moist soil. A shower that had recently fallen had left the face of nature fresh and gay, and had imparted to the ground a softness that prevented it from responding, crispily and noisily, as in the dry summer-time, to the most cautious tread. No better opportunity could have been presented to such as wished to see without being perceived, and to move without being heard.

So thought, no doubt, a man who was stealthily stepping from tree to tree, near where the Scioto empties into the Ohio, and he inwardly blessed the moistening rain and the dense canopy of green.

Although hardly above the medium hight, this man was of large size, almost gigantic, in fact. He was by no means corpulent, nor what is called "chunky" in form; but his shoulders were unusually broad, and his chest was unusually full; while the size of his limbs and thickness of his sturdy neck were also indicative of great strength. His head was nearly square, and was covered with a thick coat of short and curling brown hair.

His features were plain, but not uncomely, and wore an expression of good-humor which generally accompanies conscious power. He was dressed in a coarse homespun hunting-shirt, with leather leggings and moccasins, and his arms were the usual rifle, hunting-knife and tomahawk of the pioneer.

Having described this man, it is only necessary to give his name and occupation. He was Robert Hardnett, better known as "Buck" Hardnett, was thirty years of age, and the greater part of his life had been spent on the frontier. At that period (1790) by the direction of Colonel George Rogers Clark, who then commanded the Virginia frontier, each settlement in Kentucky was required to keep two "State spies," or scouts, in constant service, to watch the movements of the Indians and guard against their attacks. Buck Hardnett was one of the men selected for this duty by the settlement to which he belonged, and was peculiarly qualified for the position by his strength of body, by his experience in Indian warfare, by his courage, his caution and his sagacity. He was now scouting, on the north side of the river, for the purpose of ascertaining the strength and intentions of a band that was reported to have rendezvoused near the mouth of the Scioto.

Heavy as he was, and seemingly clumsy, Buck Hardnett stepped as lightly and noiselessly as a kitten. He walked slightly bent, with his keen blue eyes watching every tree and bush and the motion of every leaf. Not a shadow was cast in the forest, but he saw it and knew its cause; not a squirrel leaped upon a tree, not a bird fluttered among the branches, but he knew what it was, and could locate it instantly.

The quickness with which he saw and heard every thing was only equaled by the caution with which he kept himself unseen and unheard. Although his eyes did not appear to notice the ground upon which he trod, he never stepped upon a twig, nor ever came in contact with any object that might give back a sound to his touch. If any moving thing in the forest attracted his attention, he at once stopped, and remained as motionless as a statue, until he had discovered its nature and object. His feet trod only on the soft carpet of moist leaves, his breathing was measured and silent as if he feared that it might lead to his detection, and even his nostrils aided him in determining the possibility of danger.

Such was the silent and cautious manner in which the Indian brave lurked about the rude settlement of the pioneer white man, hoping to strike a deadly blow and escape undetected. Such, too, was the silent and cautious style of warfare which the white man was compelled to use against his savage foe.

Thus Buck Hardnett worked his way down the slope, generally keeping behind one of the large beech, oak or walnut trees with which it was clothed. When the slope descended more rapidly into the hollow that stretched down to the river, he used still greater caution, and wormed himself over the ground like a snake, lest even the tip of his coon-skin cap might be seen above the bushes.

At last he halted, ensconcing himself behind a fallen tree in the midst of some black-gum bushes, and kept his eyes and ears open, to see and hear what was going on below him.

There was enough to call for the full exercise of those organs. In the hollow were seated fifty Indian warriors, freshly painted and well armed, and one of their number, who appeared to be a chief, was addressing them. It was the object of the scout to learn the intentions of these warriors, and he could not have happened upon them at a better time for accomplishing his object.

There was another person, a white man, seated in the center of the circle of warriors, to whom the attention of Buck Hardnett was attracted as soon as he was near enough to distinguish the vistges of the party in the hollow. This man was naked to the waist—in fact, his only garment was a pair of breeches, such as were worn in the settlement—and his back bore the marks of stripes.—His bare feet, too, were sore and bleeding, as if he had been compelled to travel a long distance over rough paths. As he sat there, with his head bowed, and his bound hands crossed upon his knees, he looked so woebegone and miserable, that the warm heart of the scout went out to him in pity, and he inly muttered a threat that would have startled the warriors, if they could have heard it.

When the Indian speaker sat down, Buck Hardnett was satisfied. He had learned the purposes of the band, and his mission there was ended. He took the back track, going as he had come, ascended the slope, crossed a level plateau, and descended to another level, the first bottom of the Ohio. This bottom was some sixty feet above low-water mark, clothed with a heavy growth of sycamore, sugar-maple and black walnut, and the rich alluvial soil seemed to invite the ax and plow of the industrious settler.

Here the scout halted, seated himself at the trunk of a gi gantic sycamore, and looked about as if he was expecting some one. Soon the bushes parted on the slope that led to the upper bottom, and a young Indian approached, cautiously at first, and more rapidly as the white man rose and advanced to meet him.

This Indian was quite different in personal appearance and in attire, from those whom Buck Hardnett had watched in the hollow. His paint showed that he was on the war-path; but it was quite unlike that of the others, in color and style. In stature he was taller than they, his countenance was finer, and his carriage and mien were tinged by a certain air of nobility, shaded with melancholy, that set well upon him. His garments were tasteful and well made, as if he took a pride in his apparel; his weapons were fine and in splendid condition; his head was shaved, except the scalp-lock, which was neatly braided and ornamented with an eagle's feather.

Altogether, he was a person who seemed superior to the ordinary forest Indians, and he believed that he had good reason so to consider himself; for he was one of the noble Delaware race, of which there were many within the present limits of Ohio. Most of them had fraternized with the tribes among whom they had cast their lot, and accompanied them in their incursions against the settlements; but a few disdained the alliance of what they regarded as inferior tribes, and attached themselves to the superior white race, preferring to be governed, if they must be governed, by men who were not beneath them.

The young Delaware was one of the latter class. The son of a chief, he was a chief without a single follower; but, like the Bourbons in exile, he was none the less a prince. He was called Red Hawk by the white men, among whom a considerable portion of his life had been passed. He had gone on his first war-path with Buck Hardnett, and thereafter had accompanied the scout on nearly all his expeditions. Hardnett sometimes called him by his name, but more frequently addressed Lim as "the sachem," knowing and respecting his price of race and birth. Red Hawk, also, had a title of respect of raise friend, whom he had maned Heavy Hand. In fighty a limited and respected each other highly for the group, it is which each knew the other to possess, and the ladden two Lothers could not be stronger than was their alliance.

- "Dil the sachem see the warriers?" asked the secut, as he rose to meet Red Hawk.
- "Yes; and I saw Heavy Hand watching them and listening to the talk."
  - ." What were they, then?"
  - "Shawnees. Heavy Hand knows it."
  - " No Mingoes ?"
- "No Mingoes," and a frown darkened the face of the young chief as he uttered this hated name.
- "Well, it's all the same; they mean mischief. As I understool the talk, they are here for the purpose of pouncing upon the emigrant boats, of which so many are coming down the river this spring."
  - "He sy Hand has understood the talk well."
- "That white man-did you notice him? He has been treated badly."
  - " He has been whipped."
- Pretty hard, too. If there had been, say, helf a dozen of them, I doubt whether they would have had a chance to whip him again. For what purpose do you suppose they have brought him here?"
  - "I think the Heavy Hand knows."
- "I can grees, and my grees don't make me feel a bit frien ily to war! those redskins. It's my belt f, Red Haw!, that they wan! move for from where they are now, and it is my dury to the chair mane, by going up the river and worship the assumable we can get a force from the settlements to rest them out. Will the sachem go with me?"
  - " Will the eagle fly?"

What my mere werds, the two friends struck off into the

CHAPTER II.

COVERING A TRAIL.

Buck Handburt and the Delaware were obliged to note a long delawar to get above the Shawnees, who were, as has been stated, near where the Scioto empties into the Ohio. When the two scouts had passed around them, they strack the Ohio about a mile above the mouth of the Scioto, and traveled up the bank of the river, keeping a continual look out for descending boats.

There was, at that time, an extensive emigration to the rich and beautiful lands of Kentucky, which were rearled as a paradise for hunters and farmers. A large part of this end-gration floated down the Ohio, in "arks," that be assumed by the sometimes made the voyage simply, and semetimes in companies of three or four. Alterly several unpresent their companies of three or four. Alterly several unpresent their companies of carried by the willy savers, and their companies showly from a distant frontier, and emigrants hastened to their their departure from Fort Pitt and other points up the river, without a foreboding of the dangers that has table for the large.

The scouts traveled very cautiously, taking the great stylles to concell their trail, lest the cunning Shawness should like ver their errand and intercept them. At noch they styled to rest, and to eat their fragalineal of dried verian and ip at heat corn. They had shot no game, for fear that the sould of their gams might be heard by an energy; they make a finite for tear of being detected by the smoke, and on a love of the difficulty of obliterating the traces of the make Ait of the ner they would not smoke their pipes, lest the sent of the tobacco might be writted to the no tribs of any build a Shawnee, and they sat in the shade without that counfirst.

"Has the Heavy Hand thought," asked the Diller rest. "the Shawnee may be coming this way before?

"What! Does the sachem think that they have find at trail?"

" No."

"I should think not. It was well covered, and I would defy any red skin to follow it, even if he should light upon it by accident."

"Heavy Hand speaks truly; but the warriors wish to capture a boat, and they will look for a boat."

"Yes; they will keep their eyes open, of course."

"They will send men up the river, to look for a boat, to let them know when it is coming, so that they may be ready for it."

"That's a fact, and I had never thought of it. I always said, Red Hawk, that you are smarter than I am, and you often prove it, though you are too modest to brag about it. The results are after us now, no doubt, and they may come upon us at any minute. What had we better do?"

"We ought to hide. Find a place where we can watch both the river and the Shawnees."

"You are right, as you always are. Come, and let us find a place."

They went to where the river made a bend toward the north-east, and concealed themselves in the horse-shoe, where they could have a clear view for two miles up the river. Hardnett remained at the bank to watch the water; while Red Hawk backed in the forest to look out for the Shawness from below.

It was nearly dusk when the scout, who, tired of sitting, hed risen to his feet, heard a slight "hist" that caused him to sink back into his concealment. In a few moments Red Hawk came silently creeping up to him.

"What has the sachem seen?" asked Hardnett.

"Shawners. They are just going by. Listen!"

The scent listened, and plainly heard feet-teps and mattering voices, that gradually passed by the place where he was concealed.

"Three?" he asked, in a whisper.

" Three warriors."

"We can easily manage them. Have they from! our trail?"

"No. They were not locking for any trail, and were not covering their own."

"Of course, then, they have not found ours. It is getting dark, and they will not go much further before they camp. Then we will ercep up on them and settle them."

The Delaware laid his hand on his companion's ara-

Hardnett listened and again heard the footsteps and the muttering voices.

"They are coming this way," whispered Red Hawk.

"They are, indeed. They mean to camp right here. It's certain they've not found our trail, or they would be silve. Well, it's best as it is, perhaps. Let the suchem crep down under the bank, and I will follow in a few minutes."

Red Hawk did as his friend requested, and disapportion. Hardnett carefully covered the trail, not trusting to the dealeness to conceal the traces of their presence, and followed his companion down the bank.

The river was at flood, but not at its full hight, and there was plenty of room for concealment above the water's edicate vines and bushes that overhung the shelving back edicateally screening them from the view of those above, it they should happen to look down upon them.

Hardly were they quietly enseenced in this hilling-place, when they knew, from the footsteps and the voices, that in Indians had reached the spot which they had just left. They also knew, from what was said, that they meant to pass the night there.

Having settled this point, the Shawnees proceeded to said their hunger. They made no fire; but, a little less carries than the previous occupants of the horse-shoe had been a pige was lighted and passed around after the mod, and they just bered with none of the reticence for which In lians were noted in their intercourse with white men.

After a while the jabbering ceased, and the scouts concluded that the Shawnees had laid down to sheep. After waiting about half an hour, for sleep to overcome them, Red Hawk, who was much the lightest of the two, stole up the bank to reconnoiter. There was a look of disappointment in his fact when he returned.

"What is the matter?" asked Hardnett. "Are they had asleep yet?"

"Our is awake, He is s're ling by, hasting a in a re-"

- "Which way is his face turned?"
- "Toward the river."
- "I see, they have set him there to guard the camp and watch the river. This makes our task a little harder; but it must be done. There is only one way to do it, Red Hawk. One of us must go around and creep up behind that fellow and put a knife into him. If we dared to shoot, there would be no trouble; but we can only trust to the cold steel. Will the sachem undertake that job?"

" Y's."

"You must make no more noise than the grass makes in growing. When you get up behind the tree, you can choose your own time to strike, and I will be ready to settle those who are lying down."

The Delaware glided away, around by the water's edge, and Back Hardnett cautiously ascended the bank.

The task was, indeed, one that required the utmost silence and prudence. The night was wonderfully still. The slightest sound could be heard, the gurgling of the turbid flood along the river bank, the hum of the night insects in the forest, even the gentle breath of the breeze that scarcely stirred the leaves of the trees. The Shawnee sentinel, too, was wide awake; the moon, then nearly to the first quarter, was shining on his face, and Buck Hardactt could see that his eyes were open. There could be no doubt that he heard and saw every thing that could be heard and seen.

The scout had rai of himself up behind some bushes that grew at the edge of the bank. He was within less than two rosts of the sheping Indians, beyond whom stood the sentinel; but it was necessary to get nearer, as his attack must be made simultaneously with Red Hawk's, and their three enemies must be sileneed together, so that no one of them should have a nament's time to give the alarm. To accomplish this without discovery required an extraordinary amount of skill, prudence and patience.

Between the scout and the sleepers, hardly three yards from their leads, was a fallow her, nearly covered with vines and bushes. The sentinel stood some two rods from this, with his tack against a large tree. While the Shawnee was looking up the fiver easily watching for a best that thight farnish politic fiver for him off at 1.15 may 2.15 mg companions, Hardy the 1.15 insection the proceed, and wormed his way like a sole, "in the carefully toward the log, and covering him if is 11.15 to bushes and tall woods. This operation was performed in perfect silence, and was necessarily a slow one; but he may be reached the log, and found himself so near the Indias 15. The could have the deep breathing of the sleepers.

As he key behind the log, he heard the chirp of a criclete which he recognized as a signal from Red Havel. Relief his head, he peered through the vines that grew our time! In and detected an almost imperceptible movement of the following behind the sentinel. Convinced that his friend was placed his part in the maneuver, he followed the movement water his eye, until it ceased near the tree against which the south was standing.

While he gazed eagerly at the spot, fearing that some slight noise from Red Hawk might attract the attention of the Slight nee and destroy the plot, he saw the Delaware slowly and significantly arise from the ground, until he stood, with his leffe in his hand, within an arm's length of the gentinel.

He then seemed to be state, as if uncertain whether he should trust to the knife. As the back of the Shawher is toward him, he would be compelled to hap are all he fact before he could strike at the heart of his foe; while the could a blow with the townhawl, might arouse the shape fore Hardnett could rush upon them. The scart wishelt at he could call to him, and tell him to use the torn downship hat he was obliged even to breathe lightly, lest the his his breathing should be heard. It was with a facility of the lief, therefore, that he saw the Delivare at last hearth his knife and handle his torn leaws. At the same time he are it his own tomahawk with his right hand, at he is the lief of a panther preparing for a spring.

Saddenly the Delaward's heen tondawk that I is the moonlight, and descended upon the head of the the transport sentinel, cutting into his brain with a sickening creek, which with a sickening creek, which is shawnee fell without a word or a normal.

Almost at the same instant Back Harle it had the belief its spring, and his ton shawk was buried, with an editor of the skell of one of sleeping Indiana. As the car retained to his feet, the secut, finding his tomahawk unavailable at the theoret. Anothed him down with a blow of his fist, stilling the yell to was about to utter, and thrust his knife into his heart.

came up.

" Yes. No noise."

"Couldn't have been done mater, if I say it myself. Silent and sure—that's a good motto. Do you want the sades?"

" No. If they were Mingo, I might count them."

"What shall we do with the carrion?"

"Throw it into the river."

"That's hardly spoken like yourself, sachem. You should remember that the river runs down stream, and the Shawn estree in that direction. If they should see one of the should see one of the should see one of the should see they would guess more than we want them to know. We not hide them, and must do it carefully."

The two friends carried the bodies of the Shawnees down the Lank, and concealed them under the bashes. They then poursel, and baid down near where their enemies hed slept their last, confident of being able to rest undisturbed until in rains.

At the local of day they were awake and stirring. They first concerds I the arms and accontennents of the slain Sleen-no., a dicing the spot carefully, so that they not it that near it case of fature need. Their next care was, to oblice de all traces of the conflict, leaving the ground in the vicinity in such a callition that no passer-by should suspect that it had been trolden upon. This was a talk that required care and time, as I the syn was quite high when it was that he had

"It does seem to me," said buck Hardner, looking lack a to y I for the place, "that we have covered our trail mighty to H. I dofy the errors aims to years that we've be to a 'b', which is not be the warriers, and then they will be in to me 'b' reyes. But it may rain before that that, we like the table of the place o

The sects were about two miles further up the rise, and then the bank, to not us her backer counsel together.

" I've a' at come to the conclusion," said inche, " that we ought to try to do something more besides staying here to look out for boats and warn them of the red-skins down your der. The fact is, there ought to be a force called out to brook up the gang. If one of us could stay and we tell, wall the other would go to the settlements with the news, that we had be the best thing. It would harlly do for you to stay, as the people on the boats would notice your clarable like you; but you might go to the settlements."

"Look!" replied the Delaware, as he pointed up the river

"There is a boat."

"You are right, sachem. Two of them, by thunder!"

CHAPTER III.

THE DECOY.

Nathan Archer and his family started from Fort Henry, on their way to the frontier settlements of Kentraky. Her zarled it as extremely fortunate that Stephen Alleyne, the accepted lover and affianced husband of his daughter Saan, had concluded to emigrate to the same place at the same time, as their combined forces, he judged, would be sufficient to grand that against any possible danger. Their route lay down the Ohio and up the Kentucky river, and flat-boats were their means of conveyance.

It is unnecessary to describe particularly the constraint nefthese flat-boats; but it may be said, for the information of the rising generation, that they were oblong water tight boxes, with fides and roof of lumber or of chapboards split from eyer a or oak trees. Nathan Archer's beat was forty feet in Lattic by twelve in width, and was divided by a cross partition into two apartments. The smallest of the e-was the shop is the faof his wife and daughter, and the other was the shop is the faof his wife and daughter, and the other was the ally a led will the misecllaneous "plunder" of an emigrant-family. At all, a end of the boat was an uninclosed space of four for, where a large our was fastened upon the gunwale, one at the low and one at the stern, on opposite sides of the craft. These cars served to steer the boat, as well as for the purpose of propulsion; but there was also a steering-our, longer and heavier than the others, which prejected out from the stern, its headler a hing up over the roof, where the steer man was probably station d. The craw of Nathan Archer's boat one's hostics himself, of two men, one of whear was his son that cheeks, familiary known as Bat Archer. Put was as tout, manly your fell a of twenty-two, and his sitter Sue was a frown eyed, pretty girl of nineteen.

Stephen Alleyne's boat was of the same construction as that of Nath in Archer; but it had no partition, as the interior was filled with a stock of salt, nails, farming utensils and other tools, with a small assortment of dry-goods and other articles, which he expected to dispose of among the frontier settlers. Stephen was a few years older than Bat Archer, and was a tall, attack, thack-eyed young Virginian, full of energy and daring. His crew was composed of two stout and fearless Pennsylvania.

bor bermen, named Isaac Marks and William Hall.

The veya ers floated pleasantly down the Ohio in their un couth vessel, with the spring flood, feating their eyes upon the leantiful panorates that was continually epening before them, and wondering at the rich lands that spread out inviting ly upon either side of the river.

See Archer had christened her father's ark the Good Hoge, and Steplen Alleyne had named his the Promited Land. The two boats journeyed to ather in good hope toward the promited Land, with no labor or trouble on the part of their crews, except to keep them in the channel, and steer char of floating logs or trees.

In montioning the occupants of Alleyne's boat, an important per moves omitted. This was his sister Margaret, three years years than himself, his only relative, as far as he knew, in the world. In appointment disposition she was almost the company of the factor of the resident of the company of the factor of the resident of the company of the factor of the resident of the company of the factor of the resident of the company of the factor of the resident of the company of the factor of the resident of the company of the factor of the resident of the resi

Moral All year filt a string affect, at for See Archer, as in right to the filt limite, and See, on her plant, whale had been to appropriate desired for lover. As a matter of colors the two girls desired to be often together, and Sephen was a ways really to row his siter in his "dially" to vilk Say. The two boats, in fact, were frequently locked together, and were never far apart, their floating abilities being about equal.

Thus they journeyed, without molestation, and without my striking incidents to break the monotony of the voy as until they had passed over about half the route, when Nithan Arcter, who was on the roof of his boat, epied two non-standing on the north bank of the river.

As only Indians were expected to be met with in that locality, the alarm was at once given, and all on loarl, it classing Stephen Alleyne and Margaret, who happened to be visiting the Good Hope, hastened to take a look at their elemins.

The current was about to carry the ark in toward the north shore, and Nathan Archer, seizing the steering par, ordered his men to row out to the middle of the river, when he was hailed in unmistakable English, and Stephen Alleyne at the same time laid his hand on his arm.

"Don't you see that one of the c is a white ment" said Stephen. "He is hailing us, and you had better let the last drift in, and ask him what he wants."

"Don't know about that," replied the old man. "I see and Indian, and there may be more in the bashes. I have hard that some white men have joined them, and are wors that the red-skins."

"There can be no danger in letting the best drift in " " ward the shore, and we can easily pull out if we want to."

"Perhaps you are right. We will let her edge in a little, myhow. He is hailing us again. Hallo, yourself! West to you want? Want to come aboard?"

"No. I want to warn you that there are Indians blow, m this bank, and you must look out for the ru."

"We will do that, you may be sure. Who are you what are you doing there?"

"We are scouts from the other side of the river, and we living to warn boats of the rodskins down you br."

was ready when we left Fort Henry. Hach't yet her read aboard?"

hetter steer pretty close to the other shere, and heep a bright look-out, and not take to the land."

"All right!" bawled Nathan Archer, as the best was drift-ing out of hearing of the scouts.

" I hardly know what to make of those chaps," he remarked, speaking to Stephen.

- " Why not, sir? It was very kind to give us warning."
- "I think we will be likely to keep a look-out for Indians, without being told to. They may mean well; but one of them was a red-skin."
  - "There are some friendly Indians."
- "And a great many who are not so friendly. There are some very near white men, too, and that man may be one of them."
- "If he had meant harm, he would have accepted your invitation to come aboard."
- white man who has joined them. It may all be part of a sheme to get hold of us with little trouble and danger. He tall us to keep close to the left shore, and that may be the vary place where he wants to get us. I believe I will keep close for the both shores, and steer as near as possible in the middle of the river."

"I believe the man was friendly and hencet; but there can be no harm in doing as you propose."

Stephen and his sister soon ended their visit, and rowed lack to their own boat, which was nearly a quarter of a naile astern of the Good Hope. He at once set his men at work with the oars, in order that the Promised Land might catch up with her consort.

Note in Archer, in the mean while, had steer I his ark out into the middle of the river, and was carefully watching both brits for signs of an enemy. It had required some rowing to get the beat into this position, for which reach Alleyne's or it had gained on the other quite slowly.

It was not long before the old man, standing on the roof of the Good Hope, caught sight of a man on the right bank of the river, who was running up and down and beckoning to the loat. He was a white man, nearly n. 'd, end his piterous gestures indicated that he was in great trouble.

Archer, a blrewing the man who shoul at the bew our.

"That is a white man, sir, and he is in trouble; no doubt about that. I think we might steer in and find out what is the matter?"

Mr. Archer hesitated a moment, and then steered the talk in toward the shore, while the man on the bank continued his pitcous gestures and silent appeals.

"What is the matter? What do you want?" wked the cll man, when he was near enough to make himself hear !.

on board!"

" Are there any Indians about here?"

"No, they have crossed the river; but they will seen come back and find me. I don't know which way to go, and am nearly starved."

"You see I was right, Tom Blodgett," said the old nam, when I said that the chap up yonder had some motive in sending us over to the other side, just where the Indians could have easily picked us off."

"Don't you know that man, father?" asked Susan, who had been brought out by this new excitement.

" No. Do you?"

" I believe it is Amos Darnel."

Anading his eyes with his hands. "He is in trouble, anyhow, and we ought to take him off. Give a strong pull with year, Tom Blodgett, and we will run right in. Look off, year man ashore, and be ready to jump ab and as soon as we into the bank."

A few sweeps of the long bow our turned the ask tower the bank. But Archer then plied his our, and the Golding slowly neared the shore, the man on the bank walair release to meet it.

"Look alive, now!" shorted Nathan Archer. "Jamp quill, and we will shove right off!"

Those were the last words he spoke. Harly hel the ark touched the shore, when there came a volley of links have in in the forest, and the next moment the bank was alive with jolling Indians.

The old man and Tom Blodgett fell deal, one shot through the heat, But Arch : through the heat.

by this unexpected reception, lost his presence of min't for a moment, but soon regained it, and seized a pole to publish off the boat.

His effort was unsuccessful. The savages were already in possession of the boat, and he was stunned with the blow of a tomakawk before he could drop the pole and defend himself.

When he recovered his senses, he found himself lying on the bank, bound, and guarded by two Indians. His mother and sister were seated near him, also under guard, and the rest of the Indians were pleasantly engaged in plundering the boat.

CHAPTER IV.

A FLOATER.

Streven Allower's boat, as the reader has been informed, was a little distance behind the Good Hope, and Marks and Hall were gradually shortening the distance by rowing, while the proprietor of the boat was on the roof, managing the steeringoat.

"What is the old man up to now?" a ked Hall, who was at the low ear, as he saw the Good Hope turning in toward the shere. "He surely can't be meaning to land."

"There is a white man on the bank," replied Stephen.
"Don't you see him? He is making signals, as if he is in distress. Now they are talking with him; but I can't make out what is said."

of the old man - so extra cautious as he has always been."

"I am afraid there is some trick in it, though it is hard to have that any white man would be mean enough to act as a decay for those bloody savages. We had better edge in toward the shore: Pull up lively, Isaac."

Both cursuen bent to their sweeps, and the head of the Princed Land was turned toward the shore, just as the Good

II .; . touched the bank.

" My God !"

This exclunation was forced at the same time from the His of Stephen Alleyne and Will Hall, as the rities of the concealed Indians were discharged with deadly effect among the crew of the Good Hope. Marks, who had not been able, from his position, to see what was going on, stood up and looked over the roof; while Margaret Alleyne, her face white with terror and anxiety, peered out at the little window in the side of the boat.

Stephen Alleyne acted like a crazy man. He called franciscally for his ritle, and, with a strong sweep of his steering-ar, turned the boat's head directly toward the shore.

- "What are you doing?' screamed Hall, as he rowed vizerously to counteract the effect of the steering-oar.
- "Don't you see that they are murdering our friends? The old man and Blodgett are shot and Ben Archer is down, and Sasan will be killed unless we can help her."
- "But we can do nothing by going ashore. We will only give the red-skins our own scalps, and make must is worse. Don't you know that your sister is on this beat? Do you want her to be killed?"

By the united exertions of the oarsmen the ark was terned from the dangerous direction, and was again brought out into the channel, where it was beyond the reach of Shawnee bulb is. Stephen Alleyne descended from the roof, Margaret came out from the interior of the boat, and all gazed in silence at the spot where their friends had been murdered and captured. They saw the savages carry Susan Archer ashore, together with her mother and brother, and watched them as they proceeded to pile their plunder out on the bank.

- "You see, Mr. Alleyne, that we could do nothing," said Will Hall.
- "You were right, Will. We would only have lost our lives, without accomplishing any thing. And yet, something most be done. We don't deserve to be called men, if we all w those red-skins to kill our friends, or to carry them off, without making an effort to save them."
  - " What can we do with such odds against u ?"
- "I can't tell you now. The odds are very heavy; hat something may be gained by stratagem. There is one this we can do—we can anchor the boat here, and on this of the matter at our leisure. We must not forget to trust to Prevulence, as well as to rely upon ourselves."

"It is a denterous plan, sir. The Indians have the other best, and they can flest down to us whenever they want to."

"I talieve we could best them off, and I feel sure that we could be them. What co you think, Margaret? Can we desert our friends?"

"By no means. We must stay by thera as long as it is person to be in them. I hope you are not afraid, Will Hall."

"Not for myself, miss; but I am a little skeered for you.
It you want to stay, you will find that Will Hall will stay as long as any man."

The Promised Land was anchored in the middle of the river, within sight of the captured boat. Stephen Alleyne, ghomy but determined, busied himself in cleaning his ride and ranning bullets, and the two oarsmen followed his example, while Margaret prepared supper.

After saper they sat out at the bow of the bost, discussing plans for assisting their friends, and the chances of being themselves attacked. There was no change visible on shore. The In it as had finished plan bring the Good Hope, and, to judge by the noise they made, were enjoying a caron e.

Isaac Marks noticed a log floating down toward them, and call I Alleyne's attention to it, remarking that he feared it might hit the boat.

"No danger," replied Stephen. "It will go just to the right of us."

"Provided it don't take a notion to which around."

"It can't whirl quick enough to hit us. But there is something else about that log, Isaac. It seems to me that I see a man's head alongside of it.

"I shink I do see a bunch of ha'r. Can you see it, Will Hall?"

"Yes; and I see a man's land against the log. Do you think it is an Indian, Mr. Alleyne?"

"One Indian would hardly dare to come to us in that mannor; but we will be ready for him, what ver he is."

" Hallo the boat !"

The rail from the low was so low that it could not policy be hear! on shore, and the voice was not that of an Indian.

"Hallo, yourself!" replied Stephen. "Are you white or red?"

"White, if I know myself," answered the stronger, as he raised his head above the log. "Will some of you reach down and take my g in as I come by the best?"

The log drifted within a few feet of the ark, and Stylen reached down and took the ride that was handed to him. The stranger disappeared for a moment, then rose on the near side of the left, and drew himself up at the side of the best.

"You swim like a fish," said Stephen, as he helped him up,
"I would like to know how you kept your rifle dry."

"That tree had forks enough to lay it on, sir. My powder-horn is water-proof, and a little wetting won't hurt my bullets, and I reckon I am all right."

"We are very well pleased to see a white man here, and would be glad to know who you are and where you come from."

"I am commonly called Buck Hardnett, and I hope the lady will excuse my looks, which are those of a drown-lod rat," replied the stranger, with a shy glance at Margaret Alleyne.

"Are you not the same man who hailed us from the bank this morning, above here?"

"It was the other boat that I hailed, I believe. The old man didn't seem disposed to follow the advice I gave him."

"He saw an Indian with you, and was supicious; but I don't think he would have landed if he had not been entired to the shore by a white man."

"Ah! that white man! I 'lowed that the red skins meant to use him in that way."

" Is he a renegade?"

" A what, sir?"

"Is he a white man who has joined the Indiana, like Simon Girty?"

"Not quite so bad as that, perhaps. It's a trick the relskins have started lately, here on the river. They each a white man, and whip him or scare him half to death, will they make him obey their orders like a deat. Then they set him out on the bank, when a boat comes along to present that he is in distress, and so bring the boat to land. Then the red-skins, who are hid in the bushes, that it easy to capture the boat and kill the people, just as you have seen this evening."

"That white man, then, was forced to act as he did?"

- "I suppose he was, sir; but it does seem to me that any white man who had half a heart would rath r be killed than help to murder his own people. I don't claim to be any better than the common run of folks; but they couldn't force me into such a thing by burning me a dozen times."
  - "You speak like a man. But I have forgotten to offer you any thing to eat, and you must be hungry."

" I am used to that, sir."

" Murgaret, set out some supper for our friend."

"Where were you when the other bout was capture!?"

a ked Stephen, while the scout satisfied his hunger.

Not far behind you, sir. In fact, I was nearly abreast of your boat. I was afraid that something wrong would happen, and I edged down the bank to watch you."

" What Indian was that who was with you?"

of mine." Hawk is his name. He is a Delaware, and a partner

"Where is he now?"

"I left him on shore, thinking you might be su picious again if he should come floating down the river as I did. But he's got his work to do there. It's likely that he's in the Shownce camp at this minute, and I shouldn't be surprised if he were to teach those red-skins some new tricks before he is through with them."

Steph a Alleyne turned the conversation upon the subject that most a any interested him, the possibility of saving Suc Archer and her mother and brother. It was Hardnett's opinion that they could do nothing then but wait and watch. Their own position might soon become dangerous, in which event it well provide them to escape. It was the custom of the Indian, when they had struck a blow, to besten he me with their price as and plander; but it was hardly to be expected that they well to without attempting to strike another flow, while the Prend of Landbry so temptingly all out within their reach.

"Don't you think we could bent them off?" inquired Al-leyne.

The scout shook his head dubiously.

"There are fifty of the red-skins," he said. "That is, there were fitty yesterday—now there are forty-seven, I suppose. It is pretty heavy odds for four of us."

"You for et my sister. I think she would count."

The scom bent upon Margaret Alleyne a glance of respectful admiration that brought the color to her checks.

- "Even with her help," he said, "they would be too many for us. They have the other boat, sir, and the advant re of the current would be with them. We could hardly hope to hurt a man of them before they came on us."
- "You think, then, that I have done wrong in stopping here, that I have only put myself in the way of danger, without being able to help my friends? I wish you would give me year opinion plainly. If no one but myself was concerned I would risk any danger to serve those on shore; but my sister is with me."
- "There is danger, sir. You know that as well as I do. But it seems to me that this boat might escape if it should be turned loose as soon as the red-skins start out with the other. As for fighting them, I don't think that we would have any chance to beat them off."
  - "Can we remain here, then, until they set off after to?"
- "I don't see any thing to hinder. The red skins have can ex-I reckon. If not, they can easily make them. But it's not the canoes that troubles me. All these Shawnee warriors could lie down in the boat yender, without giving us a fair sky to shoot one of them. I think it would be best for the sake of your friends on shore, to stay here as long as you can. While the red-skins are where they are, there's a charge for the pri opers; when they start toward their homes the charge will grow slimmer every hour."
- "My it reave that we must not describer friends while is possible to help them."
- "She carries a brave heart," replied the secon, which was a miring smalle, "and we ought to be good on all man to stand up to what she says. But, if that other boot ever one the shore, this one had better get out of the way as fact as it can."
  - "I believe they are trying to do .em. thing : w," end

Margaret, as she pointed toward the Good Hope. "I can hear them on the boat, and I think I can see them."

"Your sight and hearing are better than ours. I see them now, and hear them too. Why, what can be the matter with the varmints? Red Hawk must have been playing a trick on them."

CHAPTER V.

THE "TRICKS" OF RED HAWK.

RED lixwk had been left by Back Hardnett on the point of tank where they had had the encounter with the three scouts from the Shawnee camp.

The friends, in retracing their steps down the river-bank, heard the nring and the shouting below, and knew that a collision had occurred between the whites and the Indians. They believed that one or both the boats had been decoyed to the shore, in which event they could not doubt the nature and result of the collision; but they were unable from their position on the bank, to form any certain conclusions.

At the surgestion of Red Hawk, they concealed their rifles and animanition under the bank, divested themselves of a portion of their clothing, and swam over to a small island, about half-way from the channel to the middle of the stream. Here they had a good view of all that happened, and their worst feers were soon confirmed. When Stephen Alleys is bout drapped down and anchored, Buck Hardnett determined upon the coars, that he meant to parson, and he swam back to the north shore with Red Hawk.

The sorms hold a brief contribution, which exhibit pointly is in pall about the hall care be at the hall. The hor was a partial of the trank of a tree, with several of the hardens receiving a partial the hardens of t

Red Hawk had his task, which had been arread upon d. it the consultation, and he set at work, when his friend had had him, to perform it.

Taking the blanket and head-dress of one of the Indias whose bodies had been concealed under the bank, he assume ithem in place of his own, and then, with pigments of take if from the person of the same warrior, painted his face after the Samwnee fashion. This done, he proceeded down the river until he was near the camp of the Shawnees, when he had a ditter, and approached it by the rear.

The newly-risen moon shed but a feeble light through the clouds that obscured its face, and the comparative darkers would aid his disguise; but he was resolved to prevent discovery as far as it was possible to do so. He did not, the refore, enter the camp openly and like a new-comer, as in that case he might have been noticed and questioned; but he's' be in quietly, and insinuated himself among the warriers in so he a manner that none of them suspected that one had been all to their number. It was easy to do this, as all were entered in carousing and examining the plunder that had been taken from the Good Hope.

Stately and silent, the young Delaware strode through the encampment, his eye taking in every thing, although he seem to notice nothing. Near the edge of the encampment, under a large tree, was seated a young white man, whose arms and feet were bound. At a little distance from him was an old woman, with her head bowed in grief, and near her sata made younger woman, who was more beautiful than Red Hawk had ever dreamed of. These were not bound, and the three Indians who were guarding the party were builty occupied in quarreling over the shares of the plunder of the beat.

The admiring gaze of Red Hawk was fastened up a Sac Archer, until she noticed him, and turned her face from him. The warrior turned away with a sigh, and strell'd d wa to the water, where the captured boat was moored.

The plan ler of the Good Hope had been employed, and all the valuables had been taken out on the beat, or heavily a larger through the woods. There were a few Shawe a line of about the boat when Rel Hawk reached the boat, and he kept out of sight until they had all gone back into the woods.

Then he quietly slipped down the bank, and examined the fastenings of the boat.

The Good Hope had a long and stort calle, which had been used for making by fast when Nechan Archer wished to limb. This cable had been leadly field by the Shawnees around the trunk of a small tree, and Red Hawk perceived that it would be an easy matter to cut the hoat lease. As the current was tugging strengly against her, it was probable that she would quickly float off, and she might be arrested by the e-below before the Shawnees could recapture her, in which event the normal less would be unable to use her against other boats descending the stream.

Red Hawk had seen and heard enough to convince him that the Showners intended to remain where they were, and the two the Good Hope as a piratical voich. He thought it would be agend thing to a there eat of their power.

Looking down the river, he saw that Stephen Alleyne's best was will there, dark and motionles in the chance, and he quickly slipped the cable that cominch the Good Hope to the silve. As the current be an to bear her off, he ascended the back, proclamment, and missist have the Indians who were collected about the plander.

The enterprise of the young Delaware was not entirely successful. There had been a few Indians in the vicinity of the had, and one of them without to go on board directly after the calle was cast off. As he reached the bank, he saw the host in ving away, and immediately gave the alarm. In a few minutes the bank was covered with yelling and whooping Shawn es, who at once he tirred thems less to recept me the very, which was drifting slowly down the stream, not having yet felt the fall force of the current. Swimmers plurged into the water, and quickly reached the craft. By the aid of the sweet, which they manipuled in ily enough, they success in in the control of the share. As there we no the first the closel Hape to the share. As there we no the first the charge the Shawness that it the called a skip that the called

All Rel Havished not the left in the relation to the leaves to the relation to

When he went back to mingle with the warriers, after loosing the cable, he strolled toward the place where Dat Arener was sold, reach no it just as the class which we it has the prise as sold their weapons, and make I toward the river, not knowing the cause of the alarm or the extent of the danger.

The guard, also, were touched by the excitement. Without really descring the prisoners, they went toward the both, for the purpose of gratifying their ctaissity, and to be at lead in case of newsity. Red Hawk took advantage of this moment to step up to the prioner and cut the strips of both that bound his hunds and legs. At the same time be point of toward the forest, and then toward the river, and was out of sight before Bat Archer could recover from his a total ament.

Fortunately, But Archer was a quick-witted and costile. It young fellow, and he instantly compachen led the period of affairs. His only concern was for his mother and silter. He did not live him of the trouble to gue s who or what it was that had freed him. It was a friend, of course, and that is as chough for him. This friend, no doubt, we aid also be a released his mother and sister, if it had been possible to be a that time. It was also plain that he could not benefit that the time. It was also plain that the could not benefit that by remaining a captive, and that there was a character for him to escape.

These thoughts—if they can be called the ght, when he had no time for thinking, passed then had a hair in a second in fact, he jourped to his conclusion in that ively, and sit in darked off into the forcet, in the direction that had been point out by the Indian.

Quickly a Rel Mach had done his work, in her the proceeding to some the stips of lake to be her to be read to the process of the her to be a late or the some the two decreases and exception had only the process of the first or the view of the process of the her the process of the her the process of the her process o until he reached the river, where he threw them into the water.

When he came to the river, the Shawners had remited per sein of the local, and were a rain making it fast to the book. Knowing that there must soon be an abam in another quater, that would draw them away from the river, Roll Hawk determined to remain there, as he had still another plan that might work harm to the enemy.

The Good Hope had hardly been a cured to the bank, when an algorithm is raised at the camp, and it was seen known that care of the prisoners had escaped. The enraged Shawners has end hack, making the night hideons with their yells, and so there had out the woods in pursuit of the haitive. But I wk gave no more thought to But Archer, whom he was able to render no further a sistance, and proceeded to carry his plan into execution.

From among a he plot plunder that last been piled on the lenk, he picked out a hundsaw, the use of which he let learned among the white men. With this in his hand, ic sliped down the bank, and again boarded the Good Hope. The two sweets and the steering-our were in their place, I aging en iron pivets at the gunwales and at the stern. Committee with the sweeps, he sawed each of these ball in two I, in the times sile, and left them harging as he had for them. He was only a few minutes engined at this i - ; I the bid not quite fini hel it when a renewed velli r down the river told him that the Shawness bud caralt zig .t of an fugitive. Then a splish in the water, followed by a ver I shat, gave him to make stand that But Archer was " I have the symmetric In a little wille be leave, by I the of precise to all a beary clear from the fact, " It is a profit the fact the charten By 1 - 1 ... the D and the last like bark, us little 2 '833' d to the state of party. He then have direct I was a feet the second to computately the disciplinated was -

Not yet do i trace real islamic as precive any trachery, or say of that an enemy was at work in their miles. Their displaces e was visited up in those who had been lest to grand the presences, as it was empreed that the white man lad freed himself from his bonds, and that their careless curically had suffered him to escape. They were anary enough to make a descent upon the boat in the channel, and, as they had no other claims upon their attention just then, they do termined to do so.

Twenty picked warriors took their weapons on local the Good Hope, the rest of the party remaining on shore to guid the camp. The twenty, in fact, were as many as the crk could well carry on such an expedition, and were fally enough to capture the Promi ed Land and overpower her crow, provided she should not slip away from them. As they were well sheltered, it would be nearly impossible to pake them off before coming in close collision, and it was reasonable to appear to excape by running down the river. If she should have this attempt, there were still enough of the Indian, provided they could use the sweeps to advantage, to purchase the loose the cable, silently pushed the ark from shore, in ent on scalps and plunder.

Red Hawk remained on shore, and quietly seated hims it on the bank, to watch the progress of this Indian naval expedition.

Down the river, about a quarter of a mile from the Shawnee camp, he could see the somber and motionless form of Stephen Alleyne's boat, a darker spot on the dark water, with no sign of life about her. Just below him was the God Hope, crowded with dasky savages, all of whom were concealed within the ark, except a few who stood at the sweeps and the steering-oar.

The Camey craft did not start out into the river rapity enough to suit its red owners, nor did its show precise at the cas, so that them. Besides, they wished to practice at the cas, so that they might use them well in case the Premier Landshall attempt to empty. Therefore, at the command of the cast, two of the matter took hold of the starboard sweep to the possess for its passes of facility that boat out into the channel.

Bending to their work, they nearly tuned the lightened boot around, and it was necessary to call the second our into requirition, to conntene to the effect of the first. Then commonced a trial of skill and murcle between the two sweeps, and, shortly, as Roll Hawk was expecting, the starboard our support short off. This was immediately followed by a similar are less to the lathe ord our, elicitie; a hord of rever from the resident to the lathe ord our, elicitie; a hord of rever from the resident to the lathe ord our, elicitie; a hord of rever from the resident to the lathe order. As the ark had by this time vecred in formal latings, we, it home to exact to use the steering reverse had by the late of the others.

I'm live to any loss this, without ours or pollles, with no received propolling or radialing the unwilly ark, the Shaw-to is at once precised that they would be compelled to abundanthe expedition and devote all their efforts to bringing the both book to land. Most of them stripped and jumped into the water, where some took hold of the cable, and others two materials are side of the ark. Thus, by dint of pulling and pushing, the Good Hope was brought to the shore, at a constituted distance below the point from which she had started.

Having satisfied himself that the expedition was a failure, Rel Hawk returned to the camp, to learn what was next on the Shawker programme. The next thing was a council, to determine what should be done. The warriors had examined the broken cars when they brought the boat to land, and had discovered that a mething was wrong. Knowing that the neither own rs of the boat would not have real tred them unfit to some, they are that counted would not have real tred them unfit to some, they are that enough were about. Two men were left to ware the best and the remain for returned to the camp to talk the matter over.

As the council was tall "in the open," where there were the city is and the parties could not be harred out, it was "-y for Reil Hawk not only to learn the conclusions that were to do it, but to librate deliberations as they protect.

It was first dealed that the ask should be "corlicted" to the besting opposite the temp, who a opposite the temp, who are the policy should be made, and another temperatures of the temperature.

It was next un nimously concluded that during and cunting en miss were at hand, or that there was treachery of the war takind among thems lyes. This frought up the subject of the three men who had been sent up the river, to watch for descending boats, and to report to the main 1 dy if one should come in sight. During the excitation that accompanied the capture and plunder of the Good Hops, the men had been forgotten, and it was now a series question what had become of them.

The council decided that the warriors should all be called to rether, counted and examined, in order that it might be known whether the three spies were present, and whether any stranger had crept in among them. When this decisi a reached the ears of Red Hawk, he prudently retired, at a concerded himself until the count and examination were over.

The count disclosed that the three spies were not present, and that none but Shawnee warriors, entirely above suspicion, were within the camp. Emboldened by his success thus for, the young Delaware crept back, in time to learn the next decision of the council. It was to the effect that the lost had been disabled by some subtle enemy, by whom the three spies had been either captured or killed. It was determined to send five of the most skillful warriors, before more in a on the track of the missing men, to follow their trail and ascert in what had become of them.

This was sufficient for Red Hawk. He had gained some valuable information, and he was satisfied that it would be dangerous for him to remain longer in the Shawn of Carp. He stealthily withdrew, and made his way through the woods toward the river.

He had yet another blow to strike. It I Hawk to as a read who never considered his work finited value here to take any third to do. He knew that two warrars had been life in charge of the boot, and it was per liberally his tribulations in the strong had his enomies by that here her.

When he came near the boat, he moved continuity, and reconnoisered carefully. He soon discovered that on of the warriors was lying at the bow of the hard help of the other was seated on the grownd, so him, and have a the river.

The young Delaware was an adept in the aut of " - line" As the waggior's face was turned from Lim, Red Hard from I it casy to warm Limelf within striking distance of his for.

His hard note has, he reached out his left hand, clapped it as a the reached out his left hand, clapped it is really in the Shawner, draw him be 't, and plus of the really in the heat was not awake to 't est
Rel Hank had not higher to do but to step down and despatch him with his templanch.

This done, he hocked for the cance, or "dag out," that be"I ngo I to the Good Hope, and found it tied at the stern of the grid. He placed his ritle in the cance, and paddled swiftly out to Stephen All yours beat.

CHAPTER VI.

A BLOODY TRAIL

Wirms Do k Hardnett remarked that Red Hawk must have ten playing some tricks on the Siawaces, the excitement am no them was such that Stephen All you expressed the best Haf that they were about to attempt the capture of the Promised Land; but the secont told him that they would not set out on such an expedition with so per himole.

"When redshins no an michilf," he said, " they are mighty quit. You need never expect to hear them, and you'll be

I had if you can see that before your feel them."

It was too lark to distinguish any thing with cortainty at that the in and they could be a rank so, that the host was look, and that the Indians were trying to get burd add to her meaning. When the rank shall on a few dark form of the Goal Hape by more is at the burd, they know that they had ground or ranks.

The literate it was on of Rel Hawk's tride," said the real treatment is for the termination of the land the suchen will to next."

"Perhaps he will be up to getting away from there," sna-

" Why so?"

"Don't you suppose that the Indians will suspect something wrong, and will make it too hot for him there?"

"Reckon not; R. d. Hawk knows well enough how to ever his trail. He will tay there as long as he wants to. He lot What are the variaints yelping all sat now?"

The Shawnes could be heard yelling and whooping through the woods, as if they were remaing, their course being toward the river, in the direction of Alleyne's boat.

"They have found out the trick that your Delaware friend played on them," said Stephen, "and they are trying to cat he him."

"Don't you believe that! The sachem is among them at this minute, hooting as loud as the wildest of them, unless he is busy at some other devilment. I'll tell you what the matter is. Somebody has got loose from them, and it is not R I Hawk."

"Can it be Susan? Is it possible that the wengen lave escaped?"

"Not likely. I don't know what it is that the sect on con't do if he tries; but he would hardly try that. If the women folks should get loose, it would be easy enough to catch them, and they might suffer for it."

"It is But Archer, then. He is smart enough to get away from them if he has a fair chance. Was not that a splash in the water, near the shore?"

"Yes. He means to swim for it. Let us immp into year little boat and pull toward the shore. Periods we can be a him."

In a moment they were in the dicky, and Stephen took to ours, while the so at seated himself at the low, with his refined in his hand. As they perhed off from the rk, they be easied shots the I from the shore, minch d with the yells of the sevages.

"They are after him right sharp," said Hard. "; 'b', it they don't chance to hit him, and if he can said well, he is safe." ...

Stephen made the little boat spin through the water, the scout directing its course. The shots and shouts course it it rawhile, and they began to believe that the faultive lad land that I in the direction of the cry, and soon picked up But Arch r, who, swimming with his clothes on, had become nearly exhausted.

"I would have gone down very soon, if you had not picked me up," said But, when he had been taken to the ark and supplied with dry clothes. "I had run myself out of breach on slove, and when I jumped into the river I thought I had rather be drowned than taken by the Indians. When my clothes got soaked through, they seemed like so much lead harging about me, and I could hardly move my limbs."

"We were on the book-out for you," replied Stephen; "but I am afraid we would have missed you if you had not hailed us. How did you get loose?"

us. How did you get loose?"

"I was siving on the ground, my hands and feet tied with hickery bark, when there was a noise at the bank, and most of the Indians ran over there. An Indian stepped up to me then, and the bank on my wrists and ankles was cut before I knew it. He pointed toward the woods and toward the river, and also present as if he had sunk into the ground."

" That was Red Hawk," remarked Back Har hett.

I ran away, of course, as I could do nothing to help mother at I S to while the In lims had me, and there might be a clause if I could get free. I had a hard run for it; but I reached the river, and here I am."

"It was one of the suchem's tricks. That is just his way of working. He may show them another before he is done."

"They will suspect that something is wrong now, and they may in I him out," a greated Stephen.

"Not be re be gets through with them, I warrant you.
It's; as helds to follow they will get out of Rell Hawk.
Miss Marraret, your eyes are sharper than ones, a well as big at r. Can you tail is what is going on at the boat up youder?"

"I believe it is thoring out," replied Markers.

"Yes, me'an; well I think that I can see some redskins, who are moving out with it."

"Only a few."

"Origina flow in sight; but there may be plenty hid in the

- "Do you think they are coming after us?" asked Stephen.
- "It looks as if they mean to try it."
- "Shall I pull up the anchor?"
- "Why not stay here and fight them?" inquired Bat, in whose thoughts over ge was uppermost. "We will have as good a chance as they will."
- "and we concluded that we can do nothing but cut and run, if they are really coming after us. But I have my doubts whether will they go far."
  - " Why do you say that?"
- "Because we hear nothing from Red Hawk. It is certain now, that he is there with them."
  - "Perleips as a prisoner," interrupted Stephen.
  - "Red Hawk a prisoner! You don't know that red slin, Mr. Alleyne. If there was any pressing danger, he would let us know in some way. At all events, there can be no harm in waiting a little while, until we see what is going to happen."

All strained their eyes in the direction of the Good Hope, to discover the object of the Indians. They saw that the heat was headed out into the stream, and then they faintly heard a cracking sound, quickly followed by another.

"What's that?" as'red the scout.

"The boat is whirling around, and the red-skins don't know what to do. There goes another crack, and I'll bet my had that it's the steering our. It's mighty queer, too, that the oars should break. Torn Blodgett and I have had hold of one of them together protty often, and more than two men can't work at them. We are no babbs; but the oars never showed a sim of creaking when we paid door but. Now all the shape says a tracker met, or something else was the matter."

"His mother of R. I Hew is mines. I we some word in I or from him if there was any done ref the Shown as coming down on us. He had //2/the our, so hake with you dha't go far. There is no more larger to night, as I think, and some of us had better get some rest."

The scout was presed to take some shep, and con ental to be down at the bow of the boat, while Stephen Alleyne Lept watch. He showed his hunter's training by dropping to sleep in an instant, not even the dark eyes of Margurett Alleyne being able to keep him awake.

All we quiet on hard water, as fir as Stephen All you could be related to the sept and hour, when he selded by a sole, set up, and booked out over the water. The morn he has the night was quite dark. Stephen Alleyne had not hard the best sound, except the slight chirp of a cricket. It might have seemed strange to him, if he had thought, that a cricket should be out on the water; but he had not thought of that, nor had he supposed that such a little noile could awake the scout.

Bu Buk Hurlaut hall been awakened by that very chirp, and, as he had his albow on the gunwale, looking out on the dark water, the same small, shrill, piercing sound was heard aria. He replied by a similar chirp, and a cance shot out of the durkness, and canar along the of the Promised Land. The secund that the cane, while a tall young Indian stapped about and such this edge, and the inmutes of the ark turned out to see the new-comer.

" H.1 they got on your trail, suchem?" asked Harductt.

" No, I had been with them longenough."

"You build done all you could, I reckon, and had learned all you wanted to know. I have heard of some of your doings, and can guess the rest."

"(but the Heavy Hand grees these?' asked the D'ever, as he is the literation is a literation of the care, and held up two rides with their equipments.

while I do not extend the two cars the accept the accep

" Tell us how it was."

It I Ham be to be the blist of the Good Hope.

"I tell you, such an, you are a wenderful men, and I have work this night, and the folks at the settlements shall hear of it. What a roasting the Shawnees would give you, if they could only catch you !"

It is High similed at his friend's compliment, especially at the latter part of it, and explained to But Archer, in reply to his earnest impairies, the manner in which he had "fixed" the oats of the Good Hope when the Shawnees started on their-hostile expedition.

" Two more gone," sail Back Hardnett, musingly. " T....t

leaves forty five of 'em, according to my count."

"Take off five more before morning," replied Red Hawk.

" How's that, sachem?"

The Deliware told his friends of the five warriors who were to go up the river, to follow the trail of the three spics who had been killed, and proposed to go in advance of the five warriors and lay a trap for them.

"I am atraid we are too late. There is time enough before sunrise; but I am thinking they will have too much the start of us."

"No. They will follow the trail, and the trail is old. A canor has no trail to follow, and is swift."

"Perhaps you are right. I hope you are. If we can get ahead of them, we will be likely to give a good account of them. I would be glad to get those rifles, too. We will try it, sachem."

All volunteered for this expedition; but the scout acceptal only But Archer, who heart was hot for revenue. To dially would carry but three men, and he believed that three good white men were a match for any five Shawn of

By took the one, Rel Hawk seated biaself in the box, II relate occupied the stern, and the durky quietly shot over to the south side of the river. There they rowed upstread along the bank, the duktoes concealing them from in pairing eyes on the other shore. When the score judged that they were apposite the score of the previous night's encounter, the durk was made har asset as river, his ied, and conceal it the der some bushes that grew over the bank.

But Are ser had nowed rapidly. They had not been much more than half an hour coming from the ark, and the five Shawness, as Red Hawk calculated, had had about half an hour's start of them. The dinky had been the first to reach the spot, as an examination disclosed the fact that the bodies of the slain Shawnees remained where they had been concern to the latest the five warriors might be secured with as little core mony as possible.

The sent formed his plan immediately, and explained it to his companions. Bilding them to hide in the bushes and watch their conneces, he descended the bank to the phase where the lodies had been concealed. He know that the five warriors would follow the trail of their friends, which would lead them to the bank above him, and eventually must bring them down to the water's edge. In that event he meant to attack them in front, while Red Hawk and Archer would close in upon their rear.

As the Delaware had said, the trail was an old one, comparatively, and the Shawnees were compelled, especially as it was quite dark, to follow it slowly. Their follow had been whith a for them nearly half an hour when they came in sight. In fact, they did not "come in sight" then, as they were older it to fallow the trail past the little bend, and then to trace it tack until it brought them to the spot where the three spire had camped the previous night.

As they came out upon the horse shoe, they looked around them cautiously, and extended the ground carefully, turning up the laws with their flagers, and scrutinizing every twig and stick. At last one of them discovered some spots of black on a laft. Not content with the evidence of his eyesight, he smalled the spots and tasted them. He then presed the land on a lamong his companions, who grunted in unison.

A more careful examination of the ground followed, and it was evaluate to Red Hawk, who understood their language that they is level their comrades had been killed at that spet. It remains a for them to search for the bodies, and a trace was four that I d down the bank to the river. It was then again it are of their number should go down to the river to so what was to be sent there, while the others should wait upon the bank.

The time had come for Bank Hardnett to play his part, and he than early. Croaching low in his concealment, within reach of the bodies, with his knife in his hand, he waited in silence for his foe.

Cautiously the Shawnee descended the bank, looking and feeling for the trail as he wert. Dark as the night was, he did not lose it, and it brought him to the water's edge, close to the place where Buck Hardnett was conscaled. He raised the ball is tabler which the bolies lay, and saw than there in a heap. He put out his hand and touched them, uttaing a low, guttural exclamation.

His last breath went with that "ugh!" The grip of the stalwart scout was on his throat, compressing his wind-pipe, and rendering respiration impossible. Before he could begin to struggle, the knife of the scout was in his heart, and he sink to the ground, a corpse. It was murderous work; but it was the style of warfare which the white man had been compelled, in self-defense, to learn from the Indian.

Hardnett threw the body under the bashes with the others, and awaited the next development.

Red Hawk and Bat Archer, securely concealed, had watched the Indians on the bank, and waited for Hardnett to give them the signal to attack. Hearing nothing from him, they concluded that all was working well, and that they must still wait.

The Shawnees, in the mean time, became unersy concerning their comrade. They looked over the bank, but neither new nor heard any thing but the rush of the dark water. They called him, but received no reply. At last one of them, the tallest and strongest, if not the bravest of the five, volunteesed to go down and look for him.

He descented the lank, following the trail as the other had done, and stopped at the little pool of blood which the ground had refured to soak up. As he helted, Back Hardnett spring upon him with a tom hawk; but the scout's feet slipped in the blood, and he missed his blow. The Shawner should his warrery, and requibility his antaganit.

Then it was that the immense strength of B ck Hardnett came into play, and served him well. Dropping his tend-hawk, he grasp dathe Indian so that he could not move his arms, lifted him colify, and throw him with great force up nathe ground. Before the Shawnee could recover from the shock, the scout had picked up a tomahawk and dashed cut his brains.

The yell of the Shawnee had startled both his friends and his enemies. His three compenions hastened to the edge of the bank, to see what was the matter, just as Red Hawk and Bar Archer rished out upon them, the one with a tomahawk and the cile riwh a clabbed ritle. Archer struck for vengeras, and struck well, filling his alversary at a blow, and the Dilware, who never mised his aim, struck equally as well. The remaining Shawnee, seeing the fall of his friends, and be list a first he was surrounded by en miss, turned and field into the works have a fright need dier. Bed Hawk, feering that he may tescape, instancy leveled his ritle, and she thim down.

The work was over. The bodies of the Shawn as were left where they had fad not the dinky was brought out from its contained, the rides of the shain Indians were placed in it, and the chapters has not across the river, just as the gray light of down become viable in the cast.

"It is not worth while to try to hide now," said Back Har hett, as the book dropped down along the southern back. "They began i fixing have given those ted-skins to understant that a method g is the matter, and they may as well know who have done the work."

"Ten Shawn signe," suggeted Red Hawk.

"Yes, with the two that you sevel last night. Our work counts up a resty well, and this has been a dear war post for the reseries. But there are forty of them left, as I calculate, and the second members."

Allegaris in at, where they were warmly congratulated on their victory and their safe return.

CHAPTER VII.

THE OTHER SIDE.

Amos Darrie was no such a fool—not he, indeed!—es to run the risks that were run by many emigrants to the new paradise of Kentucky. He was possessed of money and goods, and he was determined that his property should reach its journey's end safely, in spite of the depredations of marauding Indians.

A thriving merchant, in a small village, he had sought the hand of pretty Sue Archer, and his suit had been decidedly rejected; but he did not despair, even after her engagement with Stephen Alleyne was made jublic. When he learned that Mr. Archer and his family were about to emigrate to Kentucky, he sold out his business, with the intention of following them. He changed his intention and preceded them. It was a risky attempt to a middle-aged man, such as Amos Dainel was; but, when he thought of Sus Archer, even his money getting schemes were turned topsy-turyy.

Resolve I to run no more risks than were necessary, he divided his property, sending the balkier portion down the river, on a barge that was well-manned and granded by soldiers. With his money and a few articles of value, he took the "wilderness route," accompanied by a guide and a hunter.

His plan succeeded in part. His property on the barge arrived safely at its destinction; but he was so unfortunate as to meet a party of Shawnee warriors, returning from an incursion into Kentucky. The hunter was killed, the guide escaped, and Ames Darnel was carried across the Ohio as a prisoner. With him was taken such of his "plander" as the Indians chose to carry away, and his captors compelled him to bear a load of it on his back until he reached the Shawnee towns.

As he was the only captive that had been taken by the exa great brave; in f. t, the Shawnee warriors said that there we like not present in burning such a coward. By way of estimation, and for the purpose of trying his mettle, they gave he a sound whipping, and he was eventually sent to the Cook what a party of warriors who come mplaced making war upon emigrant boats.

We a the party reached the river, the object of the expedition was explained to the captive, who was told that it well be necessary for him to play the part of a white man in distress, stan ling upon the bank while the Indians were concluded in the landers, and thus lare passing boats to the shore.

Am a Durnel had not been noted as a mean man, although the cowar by notice and his singliness in money matters were well haven. His facilities at once revolted against such an act of his ness, and he flatly refused to become a decoy for the propose of had by his countryman into danger. He was then to dup and who per had not he promised submission to his masters, and the result of his flist effort as a decoy has been related.

When he rearried the people on the Good Hope, and When he saw Mr. Archerael Tom Blodget shot down and end, in present the eremity of his ded, and was so over the by sham and contrition, that he wished to hide is in the sight of the m. But when has aw Sue Archer brought en shore, and recognized Stephen Alleyner on the deck of the dier ied, ar valsion of feding came over him. He berg, to the that his chances for the persion of San Archer magnification, at radi, than if, accommonied by her ace; Ilaer, she had quietly settled down in Kentucky. In the course of his professor her had had dealing, some or which worth the there bear bear by the Continual II be in the think his and in the pare would be flower by interest the remove of himself and Sec. ... la varie la taroni le laines il perticui arly with remerd to was the said when the matter, if he might call the gid his own. He tell that he was read to join the Shaw-I. s. t. b.c. : at a to his ill we have man, to give up every the end belong parter, to a file term

He did not see his way clear to the accomplishment of his object; but he supposed that Sae Archer, together with himself, would be taken to the Shawnee village, and he hoped that he would there find opportunity to ingratiate himself with the chief and principal men of the tribe. In the mean time, as he was not allowed full liberty of motion, he contented himself with observing the movements of the Indians.

He saw the action of Red Hawk, that resulted in the rele se of But Archer. Presuming that the Indian was a Shawnee, he naturally concluded that there was a traitor in the camp. Having no objection to the escape of the young man, but preferring, in fact, that he should be out of the way, Darned kept his knowledge to himself, thinking that he might at some time make it available for the purpose of proplanting the savages.

He watched the Indian who had so adroitly effected the release of Bat Archer, and came to the conclusion that he was engaged in more mischief. When the Shawness spected that there was a sty in their camp, and a council was held to consider the matter, Darnel noticed that the object of his suspicion was not present at the count, and he was then sure that his information would be valuable to the Shawnes chief.

He sought the chief, who was in command of the party, and introduced the subject by saying that he wished to speak to him on a matter of importance.

Senapeo, who had small respect for the trader, treated his statements with little attention, until Darnel declared that he had seen an Indian cut the bon's of the while captive who had escaped, and that the same Indian had not been product when the commerction of the party was taken.

The chief called some of the wariors to hiten to the tabler's acount, and as it was generally believed that some scret enemy had been operating among them, the matter was thought to be worthly of investination. An examination was made of the ground about white But Archer had been some in the belief that the cott bank would be found there; but nothing of the kind was do overed. This circumsture to strongly against the trader's story; but he albered so starts to his statement, and Sempeo was so well consince to their there was treachery somewhere, that it was determined to send a party to so or the woods in the vicinity of the camp, to such the the piece of cone diment of the mission Indian.

It is the sold in the male at continued, when a head in the sold is a party or claimed that they had more a case or sy, the conditional that it was sold thing different to a what they had hap I to find. They some return to the conj, inhalms the bodies of the two men who had be at it in energy of the bod, and reporting that the can be that had be a steeled to the bod had disappeared.

And a Daniel was a din examined, with regard to the dress and appearance of the supposed spy. As he mentioned the style of his modernies, the warriors who had gone to the last, and who had noticed the "sign" in the mud, nod 'el to each o' ar and confirm dhis statements.

entitled to weight.

medical a Disease? angrily replied Senapeo. "It medical Relation, the chief with no peoper was hely in the Long-knives, and who goes on the ward it with Heavy Hand, one of their great braves. They are always together, and one of them may yet be near the camp."

There could be not dealt that one man had gone off in the care; independent that had been seen, and the Showness through the like y that another was concealed on shore. The set of the supposed enemy.

The and investigation had hardly been commenced with a transfer startled by the faint sound of a yell, you his fit in apturative, quickly followed by the report of a ritle.

Some strain land tropical. The mysteriors occurs on the root helpful to bline strongely, consingular to the root of the root helpful to be income were about and and the root of the root surrounded by foes, who might be expected, at any time, to class in and destroy his party. Disheartened by this view of affairs, he was ready nearly to abandon the expedition and return to his village.

The yell had not been repeated, nor had the ritle shot be followed by another report. This seemed ominous to the thief, as, if the Shawnees had been victorious, they would have raised the scalp balloo. But it was possible that the contest was not yet decided, that both parties were solded at the the advantage, and a number of warriors were sent of at that speed, to the anistance of their compades.

Still, nothing more was heard from the support scene of action, and all was doubt and anxiety among the States, until it was announced that a boat was descending the river, under cover of the opposite shore.

It was now daylight. A small boat could plainly be took lei urely making its way down the stream, and all eye were strained to determine who and what were its every to There were sharp sighted men among the Smawres, and the most experienced warriors were soon convinced that the best contained two persons who were well known and particularly obnoxious to them—Red Hawk, the Delivare, and Hamp Hand, the Long knife scoot. The third was sopped to be the white captive who had exped during the night.

This discovery help I to explain the recent untoward event; but there was still a mystery connected with them, that was not explained until the warriors returned from up the river, reporting the sharphter of eight men, whose bodies they had found and buried. No scalps had been taken, proving to the Shawness that the work had been done by Heavy Hardan the Red Hawk, neither of whom was in the hadron taking Shawnes scalps.

This was a heavy blow to Sompeound his warrier; but there was some consolation in the fact that they now his worth whom they had to deal, and that their enemies, thou he formitable enough, were not as non-row as they had supposed them to be. Heavy Hand and Red Hawk was a like was presumed that they were the scret enamies who had been acting with such effect against the Shawness. They had been watched, as the Shawners were unable to pursue them, until they had been seen to go on board of Stephen Alleyne's beat, which was thereafter made an object of special surveillance.

Some was determined on revenue, and his warriors one grays could his do ire. If they could obtain posse ion of two such hard on all soft their tribe as Hooy II admed R is Howk, they might return in triumph, a twith tending their loss. To achieve this object, it was necessary that an inche late attack should be made upon Stephen Alberta's lost, and that it should be so made that none of the occupants rould escape.

The first requisite was to bring the captured boat up to the camp, where it could be put in order and have a fair smart for an attack. A sufficient force was detailed to "cordell" the G I if pe along the bank, while others by ied themselves in preparing ours and sweeps.

Am a Dara I conscived that this was a good opp runity for a diag bias if known to She Archer, with a view to his plans in the fature. Since he had manifested his friendly diag shi in by telling what he know of the promise of Red Hash in the camp, the Indians had allowed him more liberty, and had to draw him with more consideration. He had been provided to draw himself in some garm attached a repectable than from the Good Hope, and a min promited a repectable than in this spirits were raised by the revival of his ham had his return to decent affire, and it was with a self-surface in that he presented himself before the captive orland.

It has reinst that she recomized him; but she received him told him to be the part which tell him the last to be her many.

"Ye, I is him when Annes Dan I," was here it reply to Lissian in "I can't say that I want to have you may to rerespond to I have you to well when you are las at the first say it is a to be a formal to the responding formal particular.

ingle of the last least threatest desired to the last threatest desired thr

"A very lame excuse, Mr. Darnel. Such as it is, it is hard for me to believe it, when I see you free and unharmed, strutting about in my merdered father's cout."

"I didn't know whose it wes," muttered Darnel, reddening a min. "The Indians took every thing from me, and my clothes were torn off by the bushes and briers."

"If the Indians have treated you so hadly, it is strain; that you are in such great favor with them. You are alive, while my poor father is dead. You are free, while my mother and I are bound, to be carried away to captivity or death."

"You need not fear that, Miss Su an. It is true that I have made friends with the Indians; but it is only for your benefit that I have done so. You will be taken to their villages; but I will find friends among the English who trade with them, and then I can purchase your release."

from them. I can hardly believe that it was for such a purpose you caused my father to be murdered; but I am afrail of you, Amos Darnel. I am afraid that your friendship would be such as the wolf shows to the lamb. There is blood on your hands, and it would stain me if I should touch them. I want no help from bloody hands."

"It is the only help you will get," angrily replied the trader, and you will be obliged to accept it, whether you want it or not. You needn't look for any help from that boat in the river; for the Indians will have it, with every soul on hear."

"What boat do you mean?" asked Sue, shuddering, as a new fear came over her.

"I mean Stephen Alleyne's boat. The heir-brained by has anchored off there in the channel, for no purpose but to lose his scalp, and the Indians will soon have it."

"If you were really a friend, you might warn him of his danger, and advise him to escape."

Darnel was about to reply, when a werrier stepped up, who told him that the chief wished to see him immediately. He hastened to Senapeo, and harred that a runner, who had been left at a point up the river, had just arrived, bringing the information that another how was in sight, descending the river. The trader at once offered his a lyice and services to the chief, for the purpose of capturing the boat.

CHAPTER VIII.

TIMELY AID.

When Back Hardnett and his two companions reached Stephen Allegne's best, their first care, after receiving the congrated tions of their friends upon their victory, was to part the of some refreshment that was prepared for them by the willing hands of Marcaret Alleyne. Tack next business was to light their pipes, relate their achievem atts to those who had remained on the boot, and consult with them concerning the situation of affairs.

Stephen Alloyne and But Archer were strongly inclined to the exe, since ten of the Shawnees had been picked out that they might safely risk an attack from the rest of the party lat Hallout was of quite a different opinion.

"The o'ls are much too big yit," he sail.

"But the best will hardly hold more than twenty of the red-skins," suggested Bat,

That gives us, I believe, fifteen shots without leading. It would all be very well, if we had the 'vantage of the redships, or if we could see them while we shoct our fitteen shots. But we won't have a charge at them, on that beat, until they a tright at and of us, and then, you must know, at will be a hard to-hard smalle. What does the suchem think about it?"

Red Hank a reed with his friend, and Alleyne and Archer were compiled to their their epation, which had been a versely all relations they wished it to be true, than because they believed in it.

"What are we to do, then?" is quired Suplen. "We ought to try only to in the arthur are fit ness on shore. The Indian may sond ave the river, and then our chances will be gone."

"If y w with in a hory, I neaded. The second their states in a total y we at the river a wear, until they congress to stake another it will have to go been without with the congress of the states. They have been the wear of a second without the second second without the second seco getting revenge in some way. It is my opinion they will try to take this bout, as soon as they can make ready."

"And then we will have to run away."

'Lake enough; but we can worry them some as we go. As we can do nothing but worry them, we ought to do as much of that as we can."

"How can we worry them?"

- "They can't catch this boat without rowing, and we may get some good shots at the men who handle the sweeps."
  - " How will that help our friends on shore?"
- "Not much, I allow. We must try another plan to help them."
- "Now you are coming to the point. What shall the plun be?"
- "We must get a force from the settlements, as I meant to do just before the other boot was taken. Red Hawk is a first tray ler, and no man can find a shorter way than he can. He can go to Limestone in a little while, and the folks will turn out, I know, with Si Kenton at the head of them, to heak up this gang of red skins. Then we can take them on two sides, and he sare that nobody gets away."

"The Delivere must be too tired for such work. He was busy all night, and he has not slept."

"He is used to that. He can do without sleeping and extinut, and a heap of things that are necessary to settlement folks."

As Red Howk was willing, it was settled that he should go ashore in the came, and take the nearest route to Limestone.

"Those Shawness will be watching as now, such m," said Hardrett. "Since they have found out who has been worning them, they will keep their eyes on this boat, to find out all we do and mean to do. I don't know that there will be any harm done if they see you, as they will be like y to think that you have gone over there to kill a deer; but it will be just as well to keep out of their sight, if you can manage to do so."

The D lowers no lled as he stepped into the dragers, and paddlet sauftly away, guiding the cance so as to keep to lark between him and the Shawnee camp. Has brien sawaried him un'il he had reached the shore and concealed the canoe, and then turned their attention to the opposite bank, where the It has were tourd busily engaged in "cordeding" the God Hiere up the river toward their encampment. A portion of them were "tailed on" to the cable, and were slowly had a the boot against the current, while others kept it off from the bank with poles.

"I suppose you know what that means, Mr. Alleyne," remarked the scout.

"They mean to make another attempt to attack us, and want to get the best for enough up to take a good start."

"Tiles's the notion, I reckon. The suchem was right, as he always is. The scalps and plunder on this boat are mighty to making to them, and they don't mean to go home without trying to strike another blow."

"Then we will have to run away, and where will we be with a both the permanents?"

"Not very far off, perhaps. It will take them some time to right a part the boat in order, and help may come in a new way left reathey are really to start out. We maken't forgothat wa've always got Providence to look to. If they chose us down the river, there's another thing that might be done."

" What is that ?"

"I juliar from what I have seen and heard so far, that you had rather been this boat and her cargo, than been that girl who is a prisoner on shore."

"You are right. The best and cargo would not be worth thinking of. I would less my life, rather than that she should be carried away by the Indians."

will it should come to the worst, and we should see that they wire a leg to drive us too far away, we might run ashore and leave this boat to them."

" What would we gain by that?"

"We said take the back track, at the lot spend we could to ke, as I not up their casp but rethey knew what the mater was. If we call come in the remotate of the camp, and take it by said to care them would be good, as the man, with for a game, with a care a game, with a care a game, while we in some a serious of a dest."

with a significant glance at his sister.

- "I could hide lar, where the real-skins would never find her, but I am free to confess that it would be a risky business."
- "I hope you will give your clves no uneasiness about me," said Margaret. "I can travel as fast as any of you, and I can use a rifle, too."
- "Sae's the right sort—the right sort!" exclaimed the scout, whose admiring glance spoke more than his words.
- "But it may not come to that," he continued, as he researd looked toward the shore. "I was only speaking of what might be done, if the worst should happen, and I don't think it will come to that. It seems to me that those red-skins have ta'n some other sort of a notion. They have stopped hauling ap the boat, and things look lively about the camp."
  - "Some of them have gone further up the river," said Margar t.
- "Bless your bright eyes! You see every thing. There are another lot in the same direction. I would give something hig now, if I had it to give, to know what's in the wind."
- "Here's our canoe coming back!" carefly exclained Bet Archer. "The Delaware is paddling, and there is another man in the canoe."
- "There's something up now, sure!" replied the word, as he fastened his eyes on the approaching canoe. "What! is it possible? As I live, that is Si Kenton in the canoe with him!"

As the canoe touched the ark. Hardnett gave his hard to a tall and muscular man, who lightly stepped on board. He was dressed in hunter's garb, with the usual equipments, and his appearance was quite preposessing. Then in the prime of his life and vigor he had been for many years renowned as a hunter and Indian-fighter, though his mild blue eyes and plant countenance by no means indicated a blood thirsty disposition.

- "You seem glad to see me, Back," he said, in a soft voi : and with a good-humored smile.
- "I am glad indeed, Captain Kenton, and so are my friends
- "There are twenty of us out. We are expecting a bout down the river, louded with salt and other articles, and have come up to meet her, as we hear! that the reliebles are gathly troublesome."
- "You have come just in time. Twenty men cando and work here. Where did you meet the sechem?"

- "We capture I him, or were captured by him, just below. He has tell us all that has happened here, and I have a plan by which I think we can make a chain sweep of that gong of red-skins."
  - " What is it?"
- "I a we sent a men up the river, as the bout can't be for off, to bail a her to land. I must take you ashore with me, I brieve, and it we Red Hawk here with your friends,"
  - " Why not take more of us?"
  - " The boat may not hold so many."
  - "What hat?" asked the bewildered man.
- "The bost I am looking for. Don't you see what I am driving I, man? I want to bring that boat to land at some point above here, and conced my men abourd of her. Then we must float down, so as to give the red-skins a good chance to down as in to the shore. If they do it, they may, he protry butly to oth. If they don't, we will land, anyhow near the other boot, and take them as we can get them."
- "That plan oright to work well, if it can be done without showing our force. I wouldn't be surprised, from the movements of the religious lately, if they have sighted the boat up the river."
- "Very likely. This craft will be in no danger, until they get that job off their hands. Come, if you want to help, There is no time to lose."

Alloyne and Archer wished to join the party; but Kenton and Harlantt declared that there would be plenty of men with at them, and Red Hawk strongly advised them to remain where they were.

The two secons went ashore in the cance, keeping out of sink of the Shawners as much as possible, and hastened to juntary files, who were waiting for them in the forest. The party than traveled rapidly up the river, and in less than two hairs' washing, care in sight of the expected boat, which was nearing the land on the south shore.

This limit was a covered barge, an oblong box being built from one to end, to cover the freight and preject the man, which a "number bout!" was left at each side, for the covered as of the bostmen when they were obliged to pole against the current. It was so n the fact to the slare, and Kenton went on board to meet the boatmen, with whom he was well acquainted, and to whom he explained his design against the Snawnee marapiers. Like most men of their class, they were overjoyed at the prospect of a field, and preparations were at once make to carry the plan into etail.

As it was probable that that the Shawnees were cors as watching the boat, the men used great coation on got a board, so that they should not be seen from the coposition barge was cut loose, and proceeded on her way down sto and

It was not thought that the landing of the barge would interfere with Kenton's plan, as the Indians would suppose that the boatmen had merely gone ashore to procure wood or water or game. To make appearances more deceitful, one of the boatmen was stationed on the roof with a fiddle, from which he extracted melodious strains as the barge slowly floated down the river, the man at the steering-our purposely guiding her toward the north shore.

CHAPTER IX.

WINNING AND LOSING.

As Buck Hardnett supposed, the Indians had "sighted" the burge, before it came in view of the white men who had been sent up to meet it. Leaving a guard in charge of the camp, more than half had gone further up the river, so that their operations should not be hind red by these who were on board of Stephen Alleyne's beat. Amos Danel, already his a in the favor of the casel, accompanied them, to play his part in the expected tragedy. Havery reached a favorable position, they concealed themselves in the forest, and the decoy took his station on the bank.

The white men on the bit e were not belief the Indian wariors in making preparations for the carfact. They had cut loop-holes in the side of the box that covered the box, through which, with their leaded rifles ready at hand, they narrowly watched the woods for signs of their rel enemics. The storsman, in the mean time, gradually brought the boat closer to the north shore, and the fiddler on deck continued his merry music.

The harvey-laken burge floated well; but it was not until the afternoon was nourly good that she approached the spot where the Indians were concealed. As a on as she was fairly in sight, Amos Darnet began to run up and down the bank, beckening and making signals of distress. The steersman brought the barge nearer to the shore, and the eager fillement of a bright look-out at the loop-holes.

"T...t is the same fillow who brought the other boat on shore," mattered Back Hardnett. "I believe that he ought to be the first man shot."

"Don't shoot him," replied Kenton. "We will get hold of him after a while, and I had rather have him alive than dead."

Derived as soon as they were within hailing distance, and asked what he wanted. His story was similar to that which he had tell to Nathan Archer, and he piteously be ged them to bring the bout to the shore, that he might get aboard. The filter descended from his station, and got under cover. The strain, with a sweep of his our, brought the bout head on toward the bank, so that he was a reened from the Shawer tell is, well, as the bow too hed the shore, he directed Directly to jump about and shove off.

Directly had already disappeared in the foret, and it als place up and a swarm of half make and painted with the spring forward, with terrific yells, from every tree and bush.

At they reach I the bank, before they had time to wonder at the since that prevailed on the barge, or at the fact that i roll is man were visible, the fire from a dozen unciring rils flas. I cut from the side of the boat, literally knocking them to the woods. The men who had and driving them to the woods. The men who had fire i hastened up the bank to pairs a the astonished enemy, and the others swittly followed them, after making fast the boat and reloading their rifles.

The Shawnees had been badly hurt, as well as belly fright-that their opponents were not more numerous than themselves, singlet cover behind the trees, and nale a resolute small. It was necessary that they should do so, and they fought desperately, appreciating the necessity. They would be every hold of with shome and mortification, if they should abandon, by retreating, the plunder that they had already taken, and foreroothe rich harvest which they had believed to be almost within their power. It would go hard with them, also, if the loss of so many warriors should remain unaverged. They had left a number of men at the camp, who would be attracted by the continued firing, and whose speedy arrival would turn the scale of battle in their favor.

"This is pretty hard work, captain," said Hardnett, whose tree was near that behind which Kenton had sheltered himself.

"Hot enough; but I expected hard fighting. We will get them yet."

"There are more of them about who will soon be up."

"Not too many for us, I hope. Can't you take half a dozen men, and get around behind them? A brisk attack in the rear would help our chances great'y."

"I'll try. Hello! What's up down yonder?"

" What can it be?"

It was a continuous firing and yelling, in the direct; on of the Shawnee camp, that attracted the attention of the borderers.

"It is one of Red Havk's tricks. I thought it strates that the second was so mady to stay on the beat; but it same that he had a plan of his own."

The fing and years were leard by the Indians (see Il as by the write mo), and the effect was seen as to produce a seried period and any them. Not only conclude the value of the late of the nor design than, and that the value of their assistance, they all commenced to retreat, and some of them their may.

This was the moment for the borderers, who saw their ad-and Hardnett, they sprung out from their covers, and rushed it is a limited with yells as will and ferocious as those of the savetars. The refrect was thus turned into a rout, and the white in a last a law slaughter their flying foes and prevent them from rallying.

Most of the Shawnees, in spite of their panie, had sufficient presence of mind to take the course that led back to the comp, which they found deserted, with neither enemies nor triands to be seen. As they were driven beyond the comp, however, further back from the river, they were joined by some of their compales who had been left at the camp. These warriers confessed that they had been seized with a parity but did not know who or how many their enemies were. They had supposed that they were assailed by a large face, and, after several of them had follow, the rest had incoming their several of them had follow, the rest had incoming their but they had not seen or heard of their enemies since they took to flight.

The man body of the Shawnees, finding themselves thus reinforced, and doubting whether the funk attack had been any thing more than a scare, were disposed to make a stand; but their victorious foes pressed them so closely that they were undirected under, and they were still driven back into the forest.

The white men were as much in the dark as were the Shances with regard to the attack upon the comp, with the ext ption, path aps, of Buck Hardnett, who could only suppose that R d Hawk had been "up to some of his tricks," at I d chare that the sachem knew what he was about.

"It is strange that we have not seen him or some of the others," said Kenton. "It's not likely that he made the attack is a contract that he drove the Indians off without any help."

It is an walkert that," replied Hudnett "The saction of it have been it, and it wouldn't suppose meat all it had had dense it alone; but Alleyne and Archer micht have come as a rewith him, and publics they did. They would that to do so betting for those two women, you know, an it had may be what they are looking all report."

The two mental stopped to be althor nulls and to rest for a minimat, as the Indians were in full flight and they were not needed in the pursuit. It occurred to them that it was growing late. In fact, the sun had set, and night was rapidly approaching.

Q.

"Hein't we better call back the men, Buck?" asked Ken-

toh. "It is getting dark, and they might seatter."

"Reckon we had, exptain. The red-skins have got enough of it, I think. But the men are coming back of their own accord. Can any thing be the matter, I wonder?"

"You are right. They are coming back in a hurry, too. Let us run up and see what is the matter."

The first man who was met explained the situation of affairs.

- "R mnin'! Reckon we are runnin'. We chesed the relakins ontil they come up on a fresh lot, and they sent us on the back track quicker'n winkin'."
  - " Can't we beat them back?"
- "We'll be lucky if we git out of this alive. The boat is our only chance."

Kenton soon perceived that the man had spoken truly. The Shawness had met another war-party, just from the north, who had at once joined them against the common enemy. As the reinforcement was composed of fresh men, outnumbering the whites, the latter were driven back in their turn, hotly pursued by their fiery antagonists. The woods were full of red-skins, and a rapid retreat was the only here for the borderers.

Nevertheless, Kenton and Buck Hardnett succeeded in so far rallying their flying friends, that the retreat was conducted in an orderly manner. A dozen of the best men, action as a rear guard, kept back the save as with their unerring rales, until all had safely reached the boat.

"Hold on there!" showed Hardnett, as the barre we about to be cut loose from the bank. "Stand ready with your rifles, boys, and keep the red-skins back a half-longer."

In answer to the wondering inquiries of his comrades, he pointed to the shore, where could be dially accept in the growing darkness, the figure of a man and a woman, creaching under the bushes. There were In lians behind them, Indians on each side of them, and Indians between them and the boat; but only the keen eye of Buck Hardnett had discovered them.

"That is Bob Archer," said the cost to Kenten, "and the women with him must be his mether or sister. I will take a few men, and make a dash to being them in, if the restrof you will cover us with your ritles."

Bok Hardnet had no difficulty in obtaining volunteers. The pi neers of Kentucky pever stopped to count the odds when a woman was in danger. In a few moments the Shawness, who were crowding to the river, were astorished by a sharp volley that was poured into them from the boat, and then half a doz n men went up the bank at a run, charging as halfly as if they had a regiment to back them.

Ar her, wing the way clear, and presuming that the attack had been made for his benefit, litted the woman in his arms, and hastened to the boat. Hardnett, having accomplished to o ject of his movement, ordered his men to fall back, and they returned to the beat without schious difficulty, protected by the fire of their friends.

But the Shawhers, argued by seeing two possible victims state at from under their very noses, and by the very impudent manner in which a few white men had driven them body, neshed at the boat in a body, determined on revenue. Most of the rates of the white men were empty, and they were in a prorecondition to repel this sadden and furious assault.

"This is no jobe," said Hardnett, as he hastily rammed into a boil to "We must cut the repeated telecom chances."

The represent as less, ele, and the bare dritted for a mement with the same of the bank to prevent the same of them just part at most the darger of the white men was hereby essence.

The error set in toward the shore at that point, so that the leafure of the bank, and that he is any more of the bank, and he is any more of the collections. It was impossible to use the same, as to one could expect bimself for a mement with the leafure of the same who had the bank.

but is were so rapilly rained in upon the side of the bar appropriate the light plank that formed the shelter, that the white men were compelled to lie down, or to shelter themselves behind boxes and boards, and were unable to return the fire of their anteronists. Their situation was perilors in bod. At any memorit the boat might touch the shore, in which event the save as would at once spring on board and have them at their mercy.

It was But Archer who proved himself the man for this crisis. Knocking a hole in the shelter, in the side next to the river, and taking a rope in his hand, he crawled out on the "running board," at the place where the row-boat belonging to the burge was hitched. Perceiving that there were two pairs of ours in the skiff, he called to one of the boatmen, to whom he briefly explained his plan.

The two to k their places in the skiff, fastening the rope to the barge, and rowed off into the river, paying out but a little line, so as to keep the barge between them and the Indians on the bank. Having got into the right position, they pulled with a will, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing the barge change its course and slowly move out into the stream. Slowly at first, but smely, and more rapidly after a while, when the hull was fairly started.

This was inexplicable to the Shawnees, who saw the barre gradadly beaving the bank, carrying their victims out of their reach, and who were unable to discover by what means it was propeded. Yelling with rage, they fired more rapidly into the craft, without electing any reply, and without stopping its sure and gradual motion. It was not until they had scattered themselves up and down the river, so that they were able to tee the skiff behind the barge, that they perceived how their chemics were slipping away from them.

This discovery caused them to aim their ritles at the skiff, and their builds splashed into the water around But Archer and his companion, who hast need to back up to the shelter of the large. But the object of the rowers had been a complicate. The barge had sufficient impulse to carry it within the rath one of a chericarrent, which quickly here it out of the reach of arrows or billets. The best on cause out in mathematical of arrows or billets. The best on cause out in mathematical cherists, and the barge sweets stely down the river, until it anchored alongside of Stephen Alleyne's boat.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FLANK ATTACK.

RED Hawk had made no objection to being left behind on the boot, when Kenton and Hurdnett started on the expedition arrivant the Shawness. His comrade, who was well acquainted with his peculiarities, had wondered at this, but accounted for it by supposing that the Delaware absolutely felt the need of rest.

He was first in his supposition. The Delaware need of rest, at I meant to take it; but his active mind was at work, and he althody had a plan matured for active operations. After a few moments' conversation with Bat Archer, he had down on the plank theor of the ark, and was askep in an instant.

Archer, in the mean time, took his station at the low with Stephen Alleyse, and watched for the boat from whose coming so much was expected. As soon as it appeared in sight, for up the river, he awoke Red Hawk.

The D laware had no need to rub his eyes. As soon as he was to a ned he was on his feet, wide awake and eater her sellen. A single of meetup the river tood him all that he wished to know in that quarter, and he turned to Bat, point ing at the career that lay along the table.

"C" ... . ... "We may to to v. ... "

the Income the later that the can examine the Arener La collines to the later than the can examine the can be an examined year own, I precome in I don't know why year and to combine out. At least tell me what you mean to do."

The Line of the Line of your sister."

Of your sister."

That is very considerate, and perhaps you are right; but "It is Red Hawk's plan. He proposes to go ashore somewhere below the camp of the red-skins, and to creep up hehind them, so as to be ready to take a hand when our frien ? at the r.v.r begin to fight. We will each take two r.f. s, and he pe to give the reds such a volley as will make a little confusion among them. If the plan works well, we may be also to get mother and Sue out of their hands."

"The plan is a good one, and there is only one of jerion to it—that you are leaving me out. Six riths would be much better than four, and you know very well that I have a personal interest in the matter."

"But there is Margaret."

"Margaret will be safe with Hall and Marks. It is not likely the Indians will trouble the boat, as they will have their hands full on shore. You needn't talk about it any more, as I mean to go with you, and you may hand a couple of ritles for me."

As Red Hawk did not object, Stephen Alleyne was permitted to make one of the party. But Archer, under the direction of the Delaware, rowed quartering down the river, striking the north shore considerably below the boat. The canoe was haufed up and concealed, and the three men struck out into the woods, each carrying two rifles.

The Deliware, by the tacit consent of his companions, took command of the expectation, and led the way to the Shawnee camp, approaching it from the lower side, a little to the rear. The Indians had a fire burning, the smoke of which would have guided them to the spot, had Red Hawk not been well acquainted with the locality.

But the guide knew every foot of the ground, and he was not likely to miss his way, anxious as he was to strike the unsupporting Shawness a hard blow. Archer and Alleyne, each for revenue and for the rescue of those who were dear to him, followed in the steps of their leader, and obeyed his directions implicitly.

Resching the erre of the slope some fifty yards from the camp-life, they concerled themselves in the bashes, and looked down on their enemies. On the side of the fire next to them were eight Shawness, some scated, some lying down, and one standing. Only two of them had their guns within reach and it was evident that they were entirely unsuspicious of danger, expecting any thing rather than an attack in the rear.

On the further side, perhaps two hundred yards from the fire, was a sight that made But Archer's eyes flash, and and I Suphan Alleyne's heart to beat quicker. Mrs. Archer and Subwars so ded there, on a little hillock, unbound, but you'd by four Indians. The old woman was leaning forward, apprently such in the deepest dejection, and her described we similar upright, with her eyes looking above the trody, as it's acceptable help from the skies. The Indian purely were like about in northeast attitudes; but they, as well as their commules by the camp-fire, kept their eyes turned toward the north-east, as if expecting to hear something from that direction.

They were waiting for the sound of rifle-shots from above, for the scalp-halloo and the yells of triumph, that would proclaim another victory achieved, by the basest of stratagems, over their hated enemies, the whites.

They were not the only men who were waiting. On the brow of the southern slope that bordered the camp, concealed by a thicket of bashed, were two white men and a Delaware In ian, crouching like punthers for a spring, their hearts thirding for venguance, each carrying two deaths in his hands, waiting for the gens that were to tell of the conflict on the river.

In Figure Cime at last. The sharp crack of rifles was here, a conclude yelling and should get but the sounds were not it is the white plant who is had expected to hear. In stall of yells of trimple, they listened to their comrades' calls of not and dimey, mingled with the chorring of a large in ly of white men. They sprang to their feet, certain that the introduction of the introduction of the internal control in a trap, but not knowing weather men to the internal control they were.

It. Hank a like a paid to predict by the surprise and it. I have a their change to a position nearer to the carpitles, and the paid their ritles, each marking out a victim with unerring aim.

Three rides cruded from the bushes, three bullets spid on their work of death, and three Shawness fell to the ground

Archer and Alleyne loaded as quickly as possible, while the Delaware used the three remaining rifles with fatal effect.

The Indians at the foot of the slope ran for their guns, and fired a volley into the thicket; but they continued to fall under Red Hawk's well-directed fire, and the remnant, believing themselves attacked by a strong force, turned and the hastily.

Not quite so badly frightened were those who were guarding the captives. They fired at the thicket, and seemed determined to stand their ground. But by this time three rifles were again loaded, and Red Hawk and his companions dashed down the slope while the guns of their fees were empty.

Two of the guards instantly fled; but two remained. One of these threw his tomahawk at Mrs. Archer, who had broken away at the sight of her friends, and had run toward them. A rifle cracked as the tomahawk flew by her head and the Shawnee fell. The next instant the old lady was in the arms of her son.

Sue Archer, in the mean time, was struggling to free herself from the remaining Shawnee, who was striving to drag her away with one hand, while with the other he threatened her with his tomahawk. Alleyne and the Delaware could not shoot, for fear of killing her, and they pressed forward anxiously, every moment expecting that the savage would fulfill his threat.

Suddenly a new actor appeared upon the scene. A white man—or a man with a white skin, and in the garb of civilization—came running through the woods. He seized the girl, and, with the help of the Indian, hurried her off into the forest.

Alleyne fired his rifle, uselessly, and hastened after the fagitives with Red Hawk; but they had made only a little progress, when their way was stopped by a crowd of retreating Shawnees, at the sight of whom they were compelled to fall back as speedily as possible. Reaching the spot where
But Archer had been left with his mother, they found themselves out of the way of their enemies, and halted a moment to consult together.

"Did you see that white man, Bat?" hurriedly asked Alleyne.

"The man who ran off with Susan? Yes. Didn't you know him?"

"I thought I did, but was not sure."

"It was Amos Darnel, the same man who decoyed our boat to the shore."

"The secondrel! I would not have thought that he could be so mean. I would have had his life, if we had not run into such a crowd of Indians. Were they not running from our friends, Red Hawk?"

" Yes."

"And they are running yet. Come on! We must not lese a chance. But, the way to the river is open now, no doubt, and you had better take your mother to the boat. Come on, Red Hawk!"

The Delaware endeavored to persuade his eager companion to wait a few moments, until they could get a clearer idea of the actual position of affairs; but Alleyne was already off, and Red Hawk, unwilling to leave him in danger, had nothing to do but to follow him.

After a little brisk running, they again caught sight of Sue Archer, who was being purtly dragged and partly carried by the white man and the Shawnee; but they found themselves, as Red Hawk had bared, in a dangerous position. They were, in fact, in front of the retreating Shawnees, who were between them and the then victorious white men; but they heard the cheering shouts of their friends, they knew that the Indians were running, and they had good reason to hope that they think keep in front of the runaways and rescue the girl without a ribus difficulty. Not during to fire, they ran at the top of their speed, the Delaware being obliged, in hunter's phrase, to their speed, the Delaware being obliged, in hunter's phrase, to the phis eyes in the back of his head," while Stephen saw only the struggling girl and the men who were carrying her away.

Se Archer sew him coming to her rescue, and uttered are an after scream as she struggled yet more violently to the ik away. Amos Dornel saw him, too, and recognized him, and the sight struck him with a sudden fear. Dropping the girl's arm, he only exerted himself to fly from the avenger. The Shawner saw the pursuers, and knew that he must fly for his life; but he was determined not to be again builled of his victim. He had raised his tomahawk over her head, when a bullet from Red Hawk's rifle sped through his brain and stretched him lifeless on the earth.

Stephen Alleyne rushed forward and scized the girl in his arms as she fainted. He would have stopped to endeavor to revive his helpless burden; but the Delaware was at ris side, and directed him to hurry forward with her, bearing gradually to the left, until he could get out of the way of the retreating Shawnees. He then lifted her in his arms, and pressel forward as rapidly as he could, while Red Hawk trotted behind him, loading his rifle as he went, and atching for enemics in the rear.

Sue Archer was light, and Stephen Alleyne was strong. He bore gradually to the left, and was congratulating himself upon being nearly out of danger, when his ears were stunned by a series of horrid yells, and he saw that he was surrounded by painted savages.

As he was seized and disarmed, he heard the glad shouts of the retreating party, as they recognized their friends, and as they turned back, eager to take vengeance on their assailants. He looked for Red Hawk, but the Delaware was nowhere to be seen.

CHAPTER XI.

BUCK HARDNETT'S SCOUT.

In was not until Bat Archer was safe on board the Promised Land, that his friends requested him to give an account of its adventures. His mother was so overcome by the less of hir husband, by her captivity, and by the terrible stene time it attended her resear, that he was compelled to developing it to taking care of her, and he was left in quiet dering the voyage down the river.

When Mrs. Archer had been conveyed on beard the Premised Land, and placed in charge of Marguret Alleyre, the young man gave the particulars of the expedition, as far as he knew them.

"I told Captain Kenton that it was one of Red Hawk's tricks," I marked Buck Hardnett. "I said so as soon as we to did the shooting down by the camp. It was right well done, and it was done just in time. Do you say that Steplen and the D law as left you just after those running red sains had got near the camp?"

"They had started into the woods after Susan and Amos Darael, but had got tangled up with the Indians, and were glad to get back out of the way. When they left me, Stephen wanted to get ahead of the Indians who were running. The Delaware tried to hold him back a little; but Stephen was not to be stopped."

"I take it that they must have got the red-skins that we were chasing between them and us, and it's likely that they ran up on the fresh batch of Shawnees that came in from the north. What do you think, captain?"

"You are right, I suppose," replied Kenton, "and one or both of them must have been taken or killed."

"One of them, I reckon. I don't believe either of those things has happened to the sachem yet. He keeps eyes in the back of his head, as well as in the front, and is not to be Ulin led on either side; but Stephen was apt to keep his sight on the gal, without looking carefully to see what he might run into. Yes; it's likely that the red skins have caught Stephen Alleyne. His sister ought to be told about it; but I had rather not be the man to tell her."

The scout was seved from further perplexity, by the appraise of Murgaret herself, who had overheard the latter pertion of the conversation. Her countenance was pale, but from and her voice did not tremble as she address deficient to Hardnett.

"Do I understand you to say," she asked, "that you be like that nay bro her has been captured or killed by the Indians."

"We are afreitthat the reladins have caught him," replied the scout, drooping his head.

When he raised his eyes, he found there of Margaret Al-

I ym's hast hed upon him with an inquiring gaze.

"Yes, medam," he said. "You are right about that. That is what I was meaning to do."

"What do you mean?" asked Bat Archer. "Margaret said nothing."

"Perhaps not, but I know what she means. No one can say that Buck Hardnett ever left a friend when there was a chance to help him. I was just thinking about the best way to do it. I must go ashore, of course, and find out what I can."

A grateful glance from Margaret told him that his effer was appreciated. No objection was made by any of the party to his undertaking a scout on shore, and he seated himself in Stephen Alleyne's dinky, after declining the company of Bat Archer.

As he took up the oars, Margaret came to him, and laid her hand on the stern of the little boat.

- "I know that I ought not to have asked you to do this," she began.
- "You didn't ask me, ma'am. I know that I ought to do it, and I asked myself. I hope you don't think that I needed any asking."
- "I already know how good and generous you are. I ought not to let you go; but Stephen is my only brether, and is all I have in the world."
- "May he live long to comfort you! Don't bother your-self about my going ashore. This is my business, and I attend to it as such."
- "But it is a risky business, and you must not run into danger. You must not go too far. If you should be—killed—I should always feel that I had begged you to risk your life for my sake."
- "But you haven't done any such thing. I don't know what I wouldn't risk for your sake; but I am called a cautious man. You must let me go now."

"Give me your hand."

The scout reached out his broad, brown hand, which Margaret Alleyte raised to her lips, and pressed upon it a kiss—a kiss of gratitude, of admiration, perhaps of love.

Buck Hardnett dropped his oars into the water, and the skiff shot away into the darkness like an arrow, the rower carrying a sweeter memory than he had ever known before, and feeling nerved to perform his task in the face of any danger or hardship

But Archer had directed the scout to the place where the canoe had been left when he went ashore with Stephen Alleyne and R d Hawk, and toward that point Buck Hardnett rowel silently and swiftly. The night was quite dark; but he had taken his course from the boot, and the darkness was rather a help than a hindrance, as it concealed him from the Indians.

He landed the dinky, and drew it up into the bushes, near where the canoe was concealed, intending to tow the latter to the boot on his return. He then struck into the woods, taking the same route by which Red Hawk led his party in the afternoon, and reaching the Shawnce camp, as the Delaware had, at the lower side and a little to the rest.

The darkness was such that he was able to crawl within a short distance of the In lians without fear of being observed; but the darkness was also a serious impediment to his investigations, as it prevented him from seeing all that he wished to see.

He was able to discover that there was a considerable body of Indians in the camp; but he could not ascertain their numbers with any certainty. He only knew—a fact of which the evening's fight had already convinced him—that they largely ournamb red the men on the boats, and that he could not hope, with the force at his command, to whip them in a fair encounter.

They were all quiet, seemingly reposing, with the exception of a few sentinels who were stationed on the outskirts of the camp, and who did not seem inclined to venture from their posts. They had good reason to believe, no doubt, that they med not for an attack from the Long-knives, and all were enjoying the rest which they so much needed.

As the sent surveyed the sleeping encomponent, he wished that he had fifty Ren nekions there. He would keep them hid would day ghe sood give them good marks, and then the raids would carry deach to fully had the sceping savages. One firsted a barsting charge would be sufficient to root and search them. If he had expected to find the camp in such a condition, he would have tried to bring the men from the bests, in spite of their inadequate numbers and their wounds and fatigue, hoping to secure a victory by a surprise.

But he reflected that it would be much easier for one man to reach the position in which he was, without discovery, than it would be for fifty or even twenty men, and he thought that he should be thankful that he had no such chance to peril the lives of his friends.

He was satisfied with the observation he had been able to make concerning the numbers of the savages. They were too numerous to be attacked, and that was sufficient. He had crept so close to the camp that he had found himself among the sleeping Indians; but he had seen nothing of Stephen Alleyna or Red Hawk. He felt that he could not return to Margaret without carrying her some tilings of her brother, and it was also important that he should get some inkling of the designs of the Shawnees. Neither of these objects could be accomplished while the darkness lasted, and it would be necessary to prosecute his inquiries by daylight, although the risk would be greatly increased. He determined to go down to his boat, and wait there until the day should dawn.

As he approached the spot where the dinky was concealed, he was startled at seeing the dark figure of an Indian seared on the bank. Instinctively he stopped, and raised his ril. It might be a Shawnee, who had discovered the boat, and he was waiting for the owner to return, that he might shoot him down; or it might be his friend Red Hawk. If it was the former, he kept a very careless watch; if the latter, he could easily discover the fact.

He gave the chirp of a cricket. The Indian started, and uttered a similar chirp.

"Does the sachem watch with his eyes shut?" asked Hadnett, as he advanced and extended his hand.

'Red Hawk has no need of eyes to watch the does of Shawnees," replied the Delaware, rising to meet his friend.

"Some of our friends were afmid that the sachem hall been chight by the Shawners; but I knew him too well to that He must tell me what has happened to him."

The Delaware's account of his adventures corresponded with that of But Archer, up to the time when the latter separated from his two companions. He then related the parsuit of Susan Archer, concluding with the capture of Alleyne.

"And you slid out, of course," exclaimed Hardnett, "when you ren up against that fresh lot of Shawnees. The boy cool hit do it, as he had the girl on his hands; but I'll be Louis that you got out of the way. Did any of them see you, sachem?"

" Don't know."

"If they did, they didn't see you when they looked for year az du. I mest say, sachem, that you're the keemest hand at smalling I ever came across. Do you know where Stephen is now?"

" With the Shawnees."

"Have they burt him?"
"No. He is in the middle of the camp, tied hard, and I Cat.'t get at him yet."

"Perhaps something can be done in the morning. Something must be done to save that boy. The Shawnees must not have his lite while I live to prevent it. I had made up my mind to wait until daylight, and I am glad that I have found you, as we can now work together."

" No, the Heavy Hand must go back to the boat. I will do what I can for the young man."

"I don't dealt that; but I might help you."

"Heavy Hand is a great warrior. His arm is strong in Lattle, and his heart is always brave; but his skin is white, and he can not creep among the Shawnees as Red Hawk can. B siles, he is needed at the boat."

"Why so?"

The Shawnes have a bout, you know, and they want more scales and plander. They have lost many warriors, and they must have revende by the they can go back to their villa c. Tom. Trow they will make ours and get their bout ready to fight on the river."

"How does the sachem know this?"

"Red Hand has eyes and ears."

'The land we have to ue them if any man in the may be the first ten, to make it it, and it in all in the line to the termination of the to y be to go them. I suppose I caight to go buck to the L.t; int I hate to leave without doing any thing for Ste-Pieta."

"I will do all I can to help him. Perhaps Heavy Hand might help him better on the river."

"I don't see my way clear to do that; but I know that I can rely on you, and I will go. May the Lord be with you and help you, Red Hawk!"

The scout pressed the hand of his friend, launched the dinky, and rowed across the dark water to the boats, towing the cance behind him.

CHAPTER XII.

BAT ARCHER'S PLAN.

When Buck Hardnett reached the Promised Land, he was met by Margaret Alleyne. He perceived that there was a look of pain in her face, although she greeted him with a smile, and he almost wished that he had remained on shore.

"You needn't ask me any questions," he said, as he made fast the dinky. "I know what you want to ask, and that is enough for me, and a little too much. I haven't even seen him, Miss Margaret."

" Can they have killed him?"

"He is alive, I believe, and not hurt."

"I believe you have done all you could do."

- "And that is nothing, so far. But Red Hawk is there, and the sachem is worth two of me in such business. He will do all he can for Stephen, and he gave me to understand that I would be more in his way than a help. I wanted to stay until daylight, when my eyes would be of some use to me; but he thought I had better come back to the boat.
- "I reckon the sachem was right," he continued, after relating what he had seen and what he had heard from Red Hawk. "We may expect a visit from the red-skins before long, and I must talk to the men about it, though it will hardly be worth while to break their rest now. You may rely on Red Hawk, Miss Margaret, and I believe he was right in thinking that he could do more without me than with me."

"I am sure that he will do all he can for my dear brother.
You had better go and sleep now, as I know you need rest."

"And so do you, Miss Marguret. You don't know what may be before you."

In the morning a "council of war" was held on the barge, at which Hardnett told the particulars of his scouting expedition, and informed his friends of Red Hawk's opinion concerning the probability of a water attack by the Shawnees.

Opinions were divided with regard to the best course to be pursued in view of such an emergency. None of the men were willing to leave the captives without an effort to s ve them; but they differed widely as to the manner in which the expected attack should be received.

"It is plain to me," said Kenton, "that we can't fight them here. They are too many for us, and we should gain no advantage by divising our men between the two boats. We could do them no damage worth speaking of, until we should meet them hand to hand, and then their numbers would be board to win. I see nothing for it but to cut and run."

"There's one other plan that might be tried," suggested Har hart, who somed to be more inclined to rashness than he had been before Margaret Alleyne's brother was captured. "When they get fairly out in the channel, we might all hurry ashere and make for their camp. We would have the redskins divided then, and we might whip out the party on slave before the other party could come to help them. I think we would be a match for either party."

"That is a brave man's thought," replied Kenton, opening his eyes wide at this during suggestion. "If we were all men, and if we had small boats enough to take us all ashore at once, I wou'd be willing to try it, though we would have to waip, or every man of us would be wiped out. But we have not the boats, Back, and I don't know what we would do with the women."

" Seal them do an the river on the barge."

"We would have to send some men with them, and not one could be spared. Your there are a little flighty, Buck, at I we must think of some other plan."

"I think I have a better idea than that, though it may be a witherer," said Bet Archer. "If you will step on the other boat with me, Captain Kenton-you and Hardnett-I will tell it to you privately, as I don't want to be laughed at."

Kenton and Hardnett smilingly accompanied the young man to the Promised Land, and sat down while he explained his plan in a low tone. Kenton's eyes opened wider than they had at Hardnett's proposition, and the burly scout clapped his hands in glee.

"Do you suppose, Mr. Archer, that Stephen Alleyne would agree to it?" asked Kenton.

"Of course he would. You can speak to his sister, if you wish to, and I will guarantee that she will give her consent."

"Perhaps we had better not trouble her. Your plan is the last thing I would have thought of, and I believe it is the best thing that could be thought of. It may be wild; but this is a wild country, and wild deeds are needed. It shall be carried out, unless the men object to it, and I think it will suit them exactly."

After breakfast the men set at work to remove the goods and furniture from Stephen Alleyne's boat to the barge. They had had a good rest and a good med, and were stronger and more hopeful than they had yet been. The barge, already heavily loaded, would not held a little contents of the ark; but the most valuable articles were sately stowed, and accommodations were provided for Mrs. Archer and Margaret.

This work was completed early in the afternoon, and the men rested, while they watched the operations of the Indians on the shore above them. Not much could be determined with certainty; but they could see the savages moving about the bank, and could tell that they were employed upon the Good Hope. No attack was made, and none was expected before night.

The evening passed and dusk came on

"It is time to be moving," said Hardnett. "All who are going on the barge must get aboard."

"Who is to stay here?" asked Margaret.

" I am to stay," replied Bat Archer.

"And I am to stay with him," said Hardnett.

"I don't see the use of that. I can do all that is to be done here, and it may be a little done rous. Every man will be needed, and all who can should keep out of danger."

"You are right, young man. There may be a little danger; but it is important that there should be no mistake in this matter, and two heads are better than one, to say nothing of an extra pair of hands. You may need help, and I mean to stay and help you."

No one objected to the scout's determination, with the exception of But Archer, who was easily induced to withdraw his objections. As the shades of night came on, the barge was cast bose, and flowed slowly down the stream, until it had passel an island a mile below the Premised Land. The same is were then called into use, bringing the boat into a position just below the island, where she was anchored, efficially screen at from the view of both friends and foes up the river.

Buck Hardnett and Archer, who had nothing to do but await the movements of their enemies, lighted their pipes, and took their station at the bow of the ark, gazing intently up the river, to notice the first sign of motion on the part of the savages.

When night had fairly settled down upon land and water, the chais were not as denot as they had been the previous night. The moon occusionally shone out through the rifts, giving the waters as limpse of the broad expanse of water, and the dark outline of the north shore, where the Good Hope chall be seen, lying nationless against the bank, with the dark forms of the savages moving about her.

They had watched nearly two hours, without seeing any in had no of movement above, when Archer perceived something in the water, to which he called the attention of his companion in a low tone.

" It I has like a man's head," he said.

"That's what it is."

"He is submining or floating. It must be an Indian. Can it be Red Hawk?"

"N. H. w. All it we given a signal. That is a Shew-nee."

"How nicely I could hit him!"

"I) all years in The religions have seen the barge go don't a reserve that has been a spy to find out whether my to a see I norther that He don't do has work has held Hawk would do it; but we must let him have his way. Don't act as if you see him. I will keep an eye on him, though I am sore he will not try to trouble us."

The Indian swam around to the stern of the boat, raised himself up, and looked in, while the two white men smoked in silence. He then swam to the side, and looked in there. Satisfied with his observation, he floated down the river a short distance, and then struck out toward the shore.

"He is gone," said Hardnett, after he had got up and looke laround. "He will report to the red-skins, and they will be down on us before long, I reckon."

"They won't be more anxious to come than I will be anxious to see them. I will have a splendid revenge, I hope, for the murder of my father."

"I hope so; but we mustn't be too certain. I hope, too, that a way may open to get your sister and Stephen Alleyne out of their hands."

The pipes of the watchers were smoked out, and Bat Archer had grown quite impatient, before they observed any further movement on the part of their enemies. It had become quite dark, the thick clouds entirely obscuring the moon, and blotting out the view of the shore. They were not a little surprised when the mild luminary at last showed ber face through a break in the clouds, and they descried the Good Hope in the middle of the channel, bearing down upon them.

"Now is our time!" exclaimed Bat Archer, jumping up.

"Not so fast, my friend. We would have time enough to get away, if we should wait till they are right aboard of us, and we can't afford to miss our aim."

Hardnett waited, until the dark figure of the Good Hoge could be distinctly seen, not a hundred yards from the Promised Land. Then he led the way through the boat, and stood up at the stern, watching the approaching enemy, while Archer busied himself with something under the shelter.

"Now!" whi-pered the scout, after the hipse of a few mo-

Something fizzed and crackled, and the two men quickly jumped into the canoe, and shoved off, paddling directly down the river, so as to keep in the shadow of the ark as long as possible.

They had gone but a short distance, when they heard a crash which told them that the boats had come together, and they saw the Indians jumping on board the Promised Land, uttering yeals and cries of rage as they discovered that it was untenanted and nearly empty.

In another moment the savages had discovered the fugitives in the canoe, and shot after shot was fired at them; but the current was swift, and they had paddled so rapidly that they were nearly out of danger, and the bullets splashed harmlessly into the water.

"How the thing hangs fire!" exclaimed But Archer.

"Can it be presible that it will mi-s fire?"

In another moment, while the savages were crowding each other on the roofs of the two boats that lay side by side, there was a grand explosion, and a mass of flame and smoke rushed up into the air. The explosion was accompanied by yells and shricks, and was followed by a downward rush of miscellancous fragments, scattering themselves over the surface of the water, some falling around the canoe, which was tossed as if on the waves of an earthquake.

"If that is not revenue for your father's death, I don't know what more you would have."

both but as were blown to atoms. Let us harry down to the barge, as our triends will be anxious about us."

They probled swittly and in silence, neither speaking again until they reached the barge, where their friends were waiting to congratulate them.

CHAPTER XIII.

A ONE-SIDED BARGAIN.

Ir Stephen Alleyne did not feel, like the man who fell from the house, very much "discouraged," he had reason to feel so, and perhaps a little worse, when he was captured by the Shawnees. His prize had been in his grasp, and he had deemed himself just within reach of safety, when his hopes were so cruelly dashed to the ground.

His captors kicked and cuffed him unmercifully as they dragged him along; but the aches and smeats of his body were nothing to the pain and anguish of his mind, when he again saw the girl of his love a prisoner in their hands, and felt himself unable to help her.

When the excitement of the combat had subsided, and the white men in the barge had safely got out of the reach of their enemies, he was taken to the cump, where he was securely fastened for the highly his limbs being so bound down to the earth that it was impossible for him to move. His position was very painful, and he knew that escape was out of the question, as, if he should be able to free himself from his bonds, he could not hope to escape the Indians who lay around him on all sides.

Night closed down upon the camp, and the savages slumbered sone rously; but it was long before sleep visited the eyelids of the prisoner, and then it came only in fittal snutches, the pain of his tightly-corded limbs awaking him whenever he fell into a doze.

As he started out of one of his dozes, he heard the chirp of a wood-cricket, that seemed to proceed from a thicket of but he hear the edge of the chap. There was nothing to make the in this; but he remembered having then tell by Buck Harbett that the Chirp of a cricket was a fiveness signal with Red Hawk. He had seen nothing of the Delaware since his capture, and supposed that he had exactly the chirp was uttered three times, and then ceased, and Striken believe I that he had a friend at hand. He could not in... her haw his him a would be able to help him; but it was to be a believe to help him; but it was to be a believe to be a friend.

S.A. i. r was in treatie, as well as her lover. She hal 1 : '.. train 1 to her fale-or, rather, she had nearly . . . . i el es qui chem it—when she saw him rushing to ! : : ... Will a sile at the lis arms, it was excess of j . ' .' ( . . . 1 lar to taint, as mu a as her latigue and her t: . . . . . . . sile ins the whom he was seized and dia . . . . . . ; it, when she came to hers if, she felt that he was a pair and it was not long before she was convinced of the allie. Her own captivity, and the dread of her own fite were princial en uch; but it redoubled her grief and anvis we have that is option All you was also a captive, that he hali ntak a wille he was endoavoring to rescue her, at i that his fare must be trailed in the extreme. She had head enough of the ter her merci's of the savages to be sure that a sport we ill be the most fatter de event that could her prolonged only that he might be significant the the transfer of the tart res.

When shows the total comp, she was not only in the mily of his was bound. She possed a restance in the standard of his particle, and thoke in the morning with a perfect of his pattern she had yet experienced. It was always to his she cishked the man, when she say Amas Dund coming toward her. She knew that had all the capable control of heart, of sympathy for the man and the did not believe that me all the capable that of heart, of sympathy for his man rank Show all handle herself to she him for him, when the last first for the milk to she thought the last first for the milk to the wors, and the must die by torture.

The interest of the second state of the second action. He had also induced the chief to believe that he intended to become an Indian, and that he would make a very good Indian. It was after a conversation with Senapco that he approached Sie Archer, and he was in a fitting mood to listen to her appeals. It would be much better for him, in many ways, to have a willing than an unwilling bride, and he thought that he saw his way clear to work upon her feelings in regard to Stephen Alleyne.

She herself opened the way. He agreed to what she said concerning the pitiable situation of her lover, and the necessity of showing mercy. In fact, he went further than she went, and painted the horrors of Indian torture very vividly. It would be impossible for Stephen to escape those tortures, he said, unless the Indians could be induced to let him go. When she referred to the influence that he seemed to have among the Shawners, he admitted it, and enlarged upon it a little. At last he made an offer in plain words.

"If I save the life of Stephen Alleyne," he said—" if I procure his release from the Indians, and if I carry you safely to the settlements somewhere—it don't matter where—will you promise to be my wife?"

It was hard for the girl to answer this question. She knew that Stephen would not accept his life upon such terms; but she saw no other chance for his escape from a cruel death. He was uppermost in her thoughts, and she feared no future if she might save him.

"Unless you agree to this, he must die," said Darnel. "If I choose to keep you in my power, there is nothing to prevent me. Why should you kill him? I only ask you to give me what I could easily take, and it is out of pure kindness that I offer to save his life."

The girl begged and implored him for easier terms; but Darnel would consent to no modification of his offer, and at last, with a hopeless heart and a broken voice, she yielded her consent.

"Swear to it," said Darnel, and he exacted a solemn oath for the fulfillment of her promise.

"To-night," said he, as he left her, "Stephen Alleyne will be free, and it will not be long before I will take you to a place of safety."

It must be here set down to the discredit of Amos Darnel, that he did not intend to perform his part of the agreement. While he was anxious that Sue Archer should consent to become his wife, he was not anxious that her lover should live, and he knew that his influence with the Shawness was not so a as would allow him to rob them of a victim, when the expellition had cost them so many warriors. In truth, he read to decrive the girl into the belief that Stephen was sale, and then expendit on expensive her from the Indians.

Parly in the night he went to the place where Stephen was commands agree to be obeyed. The greater part of the variors were at the river, preparing for the expedition in the God Hope, and he had been intrested with the war club by Supeo, to whom he had communicated as much of his design as suited him.

Showing his clab to the warriors as his warrant for what he was about to do, he stoeped down and cut the bonds of the prisoner.

Step ion Alleyne with difficulty raised himself to a sitting posture, and gazed at the man who had released him, wondering what was next to happen; but he saw no mercy in the hard lines of Amos Darnel's face, or in the malicious twinkle of his eyes.

"If I am to die," he sail, "I am ready to die like a man; but I hope that such a dog as you will have nothing to do with my death."

This man is to be hid," said Darnel, not replying to the prisoner, turning to his warriots, and again showing his club. "Such is the order of the chief. He must be well bound, and must be conceded until the warriors start to return to the village. Who will take one of him, and will answer with his the to the chief that he does not escape?"

"I wit," said a tall your g warrior, stepping up and quickly tring Septem's bear is behind his back. "I will tie him tightly and his bim well, and he shall not be seen until the chira calls for him. The chief knows that White Crow will do as he says. Come, dog of a Long knote?"

The In in polici the cool, and Supten Alleyne, after a private state disput at Damel, nor and followed him.

The prisoner was led along the odge of the encomposent a short distance, and then his conductor gradually bent his course into the foret. He soon turned, and led Stephen around toward the rear of the camp, until they reached a hollow, through which ran a small stream. Stephen quietly to lowed, but began to think whether it might not be possible for him to tree his wrists from the cord. If he should succeed in doing so, he would be obliged to struggle, weak as I unarneed as he was, with a savage who was fully armed; but his life was worth the risk of his life.

The Indian put a stop to these reflections by helting and unlying the cords. He then looked the prisoner in the face at I smited as he uttered the chirp of a cricket.

"Red Hawk! Is it really you?"

"Could not my white brother see through the Shawnee paint?"

"Is it pessible? How could you go among them without being discovered?"

"It was easy. So many Shawnees come that they don't know each other, and they did not notice me."

"I can hardly believe that I am really saved from them. How can I thank you!"

"Make no noise. I took the name of one of their dead warriors. They may soon find out that there is no White Crow, and then there will be a search. Let us hide. Fellow me."

The D laware stepped into the water, followed by Stephen, and led the way up the brook, until he came to an enermous white oak tree, which was partly hollow. From the hollow he took a tifle, which he handed to Stephen.

"Can my brother climb?" he asked. "There is no trail to hide."

S'ephen signi'ying that he could climb, Red Hawl led the way up into the tree, where they esseonced themselves among the giant branches, in such a position that they could not be seen from below.

"We must stay here," said the Delaware, "until the search is over."

The waited in wain for search to be made and Septen, when they were started by a loud explosion, and a bright light show that a mand, in the direction of the river, and then suddenly disappeared.

looked at him in amazement.

The principal in the tree until daybreak, when they described in the line way to the river. Nothing was to be an but the swollen mass of water, harrying on a ridovict the occur. The Promised Land had disappared; the God Hope had varished; there was no craft of any description in sight.

I dealt unlies el this," sail Alleyne. "Our friends have a recessary where—I can't even guess where—periods to their graves. The Shawness still have a cap ive, and I mediate there is a chance to save her. Will you stand by me, Red Hawk?"

ing until dark." . We can do noth-

R I Hous, who had made himself familiar with every feet of graced in the validity, led the way to a deale thicker, covered to first of hand his companion as they cate day. At a live of Seplea a meal of dried ment and planted to the value of his led on to sleep, while he himself to a water. They were not disturbed, and when Steplea a way, R I Hove, in turn, took some rest.

This the interport of the dry was passed. When it was now so it, the Dilevire proposed to go and scout ar whith Short economic while he was for a vide. Within an hour the scout retail in the line in the interpolation of the Showness had broken in the remaining the interpolation to their village.

is the test of the large of the

"('::: I'r | I'r | I'll | I'm, and the two shouldered their it! - I lim r | I to condition with on a line with the route will. It I Hank signed to Shawners would parsue.

on his companion's arm.

- "What is the matter?" whispered Stephen.
- " Listen!"

Stephen thought that he heard voices, and was sure that he heard a strange, growing sound, that seemed to be located in the brunches of a tree just beyond him.

The next instant a dark object sprung out of the tree, and came to the ground with a crash.

- " Was that a panther?" asked Stephen.
- "Hush!" repaired Red Hawk, as he dropped on one knee, and raised his rifle to his shoulder.

The rifle cracked, and both rushed forward.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE SPRING OF A PANTHER.

Amos Darnet did not retire to rest after he had accomplished his purpose with regard to Stephen Alleyne. He had done such a good thing, that he wished to stay awake and felicitate himself upon what he had gained. He could easily persuade Suc Archer that Stephen Alleyne had escaped, and he was sure that she would keep her oath. He would have a consenting bride, though an unwilling one, and that would be a strong point in his favor, wherever he might be.

As he was then at liberty to go where he pleased, he walked down to the water, to see what could be seen of the expedition that had set out to capture the two boats in the river.

The Good Hope had started some time before he reached the starte, but could still be son, for out in the channel, slowly floring down the dark river. There were a number of warriors on the back, watching the course of the boat, and from one of teem Dame! Jearned that the barge had gone down the river just at dusk.

- "Was it not suppose i," he asked, "that all the white men had escaped in her?"
- "No. If they had all some, they would have taken the other best. Best eas a good swimmer had gone out to the boat, and had returned and reported that there were men on board.

It was the general opinion that the warriors would have an easy victory if the boat should not escape, and she had shown no sign of intending to make the attempt. It may be said, this time to the credit of Amos Darnel, that he hoped the white man might escape, as he had no personal interest in their death or capture.

As long as the boats could be seen by those on shore, that which was at anchor had not moved from its position; but the night soon became so dark that nothing could be seen. The attack, however, must be made in a short time, and Durnel waited with the warriors, listening for the shots and shouting, from which they would be able to tell how the encounter went.

Neither shots nor shouting were heard. Instead, there was a terrible explosion, a great flash of light; then all was silence and darkness.

Amos Darael could guess at what had happened; but the Indicus were mystified and horror-struck. Others came down to the short, and they waited until daylight for their warriors to return; but they saw nothing more of those who had stated on the Good Hope. Morning showed them no hout, no vestige of a wreck, nothing but the expanse of swift-flowing water.

The Indians were overcome by this last disaster, the more so because it was unexplainable. Their friends had left them—strong and valuant warriors—had been watched as they floated down the stream—thick darkness had shut them from the sight of the watchers—and then—what could it be but the fire of the Great Spirit that had suddenly consumed them? It was certain that they had vanished utterly, in a blaze of fire, leaving no word or sign.

This visit it en-for such the Shawness considered it—had a powerful effect after them. Amid all their bloodthirstiness and country, they maintained a deep awe and veneration for the Gall Stirk, the creator on I ruler of all, and it was evident that He was angry with them.

Nothing remained but to abundon the expedition, which had been aftended with such a loss of life, and to which the Great Spirit was so plainly opposed. It was unanimously resolved to return at once to the Shawnee towns, and the rest of the day was spent in making preparations for departure. Some of the warriors even doubted whether they ought to further offend the Great Spirit by carrying away the plan ler that they had taken from the Good Hope. But avarice prevoled over superstition, and every thing portable was packed for transportation.

It was then that Ames Darnel form! himself in trouble.

The chief whose friendship he had formed, and who had lately patronized him and confided in him, had been the leader of the expedition on the Good Hope, and had vanished with the rest of the puty. The chief who now took command was the same who had led the last band of Shawness that cone from the north. This chief "knew not Joseph," nor was he well acquainted with Amos Darnel; but he did know that a white man who had been taken prisoner eight to be fortheomias, and he made inquities concerning him. He was referred to Darnel as the man who was responsible for the disappearance of the prisoner.

Darnel explained that he had can ed Alleyne to be unbound by the order of Surpeo, with whom he had made an agreement for a certain purpose, and who had given him his word ib in token of nationity. It had not been the intention to refere the prisoner, and he had not be nucleused. On the contrary, he had been given in charge to a warrior named White Crow, who had promised to hide him and keep him soly, and it was to be supplied that he was somewhere in the vicinity of the cump. If the chief would cause search to be made for White Crow, the prisoner would soon be produced.

"White Crow!" exclaimed the Chief, in amazement.
"White Crow is deal!"

"We he one of the warriors who went on the big boat?"

"Here, III I har him the limbert left the shore. I

It was Dar I's tarm to be ast misled. There was no such per on as White Crow, and Stephen Alleyne had been spirited away. Amos Danel had performed his promise to Sac

Archer without intending it. He was by no means pleased at this turn of affairs, and was anxious that search should at one be made for the lost prisener; but the chief refused to make any ell m, say har that the white man had got so far away that it will be made to look for him.

Tetralais, the Indians were inclined to believe that the spirit of the shin war, r. White Crow, had carried away the prisent, and they saw in this mysterious event another indication of the diplesure of the Great Spirit. Ames Darnel, who had no saper titions notions, was ready to connect the disappearance of Steplen All yne with the strange Indian who and released B. Archer, and who had troubled the Shawnees so boldly and secretly.

This set him to thinking. It was possible that Stephen and his In line friend might be still hovering about the camp, in the hope of effecting the rescue of Susan; but they could do nothing against such a body of Shawnees, and it was probable that they would go to join their friends, who had un doubtelly moved down the river. At all events, he need not expect that they would trouble him.

He easily dismiss I this fear from his mind; but there was and ther made rather care d him anxiety. The new chief was not his fried, and he could see that many of the warriors Loke! upon him with supicion. If he should accompany the Shawnes to their village, he might not find it so easy to carry out his designs with regard to Sue Archer as he had supposed it would be. Even with her consent, it was doubtful whether he would be able to mile her his wife and take her out of the hands of the Indians.

That was, is, a quarter of personal safety. A number of the little william, all he had no leager a powerful I". ". Il west I had that this dislike would increase, rille ili i id, and it was I will that they might take it is their hands to territor him at the value, in the place citheria : Twin laice. [ ].

He was int a man to ran sich a risk if he could help it, palled all the there is the part of the matter before he came to the chille hit he hast get away from his uncertain frictile. As he had his liberty, it would be easy to escape, L: . h. th. ng'at that he would be able to take Sucan with him. He would carry her to some settlement where he was unknown; she would fulfill her promise, and all would be well.

He went to her after the Indians had started, and informed her that he had procured the release of Stephen Alleyne, as he had promised to do. She had already heard that the white man had escaped, and was satisfied. Sepposing that the escape had been effected with the connivance of Darnel, she did not question him any further, and he proceeded to explain the plan by which he proposed to free himself and her from the power of the Indians. As he was insecurely guarded, he thought that it would not be difficult, when the band should stop to rest, to spirit her away. Once in the woods, the darkness would be their protection, and they could remain in concealment until morning, when they could make their way to the river.

Susan silently assented to all he said. She no longer had a will of her own. She had sacrificed herself to save the life of her lover, and she hardly cared what might become of her. She believed that she could protect herself from Darnel, if it should be necessary, and almost any toing would be better than an endless captivity among the savages.

Darnel remained near her, waiting until some interruption in the march should give him an opportunity to slip away with her.

The opportunity came sconer than he could have hoped, and in a manner that he would not have expected.

The line of march led across a ravine, the sides of which were so preciptous that they were difficult to climb. As the Indians were descending, one of the foremost, who was loaded with a heavy iron kettle, missed his feeding, and fell to the bottom. The fall might pot have injured him seriously; but it so happened that the kettle fell upon his head, crushing his skull, and he expired in a few minutes.

Here was another striking proof that the Great Spirit was anary with his red children. Those who had objected to taking away the plunder called attention to this signal stroke of vengeance, and it was at once decided that it must be carried no further. Every thing was thrown upon the ground, and no Shawnee could again be induced to touch an article of the plunder.

But this was not sufficient to propitiate the angry deity. A clamor was rais I that the white people must go free, that they must be sent away, and then the Great Spirit might permit his red children to reach their homes in safety.

After a little hesitation this course was adopted. A rifle was given to Amos Dunel, with some dried meat and parched corn, and then the white people were told that they might go where they pleased. They hastened to avail themselves of this permission, as the mood of the savages might change at any mement, and were soon out of sight of the Shawnes, on the back trail.

The trail was plain enough; but the night was dark, and Ames Daniel had little knowledge of woodcraft. Their progress was so slow, that he seen proposed that they should halt and rest until daylight. It was necessary, he said, to follow the trail back to the river, and it was almost impossible for him to keep it while the darkness lasted.

Susan, we rry and heartsick, readily consented, and Darnel spread a blanket for her, promising to keep watch while she slept.

Sleep visited her tired eyelids after a while; but she soon awoke with a start and a faint cry. Raising herself on her arm she saw Amos Darnel standing at a little distance, leaning on his rifle.

- "What is the matter?" he asked.
- "I was frightened. Did you hear nothing?"
- " No."

But Susan dil hear something at that moment—a strange growling sound, that seemed to be up in the air, and that sent shad 'er after shad ier over her frame. Darnel heard it, too, and he looked inviously up into the trees.

There was a rush of a dark object from above, and Darnel was keedlover by the string of a pather, which fistened its teeth in his mack as it bore him to the ground.

S'san gazel at the beast in herror, unable to move or to speak.

Then came the sharp report of a rifle, and she fainted.

CHAPTER XV.

CONCLUSION.

Archer's ganpowder experiment should prove a success, to make an immediate attack upon the Shawnee camp, hoping to surprise and conquer the remnant of the band of six less; but the night was so far gone when the canoe reached the barge, that they perceived that they would herdly have time to get all their purty on shore by daylight. As the Shawnees were still too numerous for them to hope to succeed except by a surprise, they were obliged to defer the attick.

They waited, with a reasonable degree of patience, until dusk, when they commenced ferrying the men to the shore in the canoe and dinky and the skiff that belonged to the barge, one wounded man being left on the barge with Mrs. Archer and Margaret. As this operation required considerable time, it was quite dark when all were on shore and ready to advance.

Hardnett took the lead, the rest of the party following bim in single file. He struck as straight a course as possible for the Shawnce encampment, and all moved forward at a brisk pace; but it was not until the hapse of an hour that they found themselves near enough to commence operations.

The scout halted the party, and requested his companions to remain where they were, while he should go forward alone and reconnoiter the position of the enemy. He was gone but a short time, and a turned with the intenizence that the camp was deserted.

He was well enough acquainted with Indian character to be to ances at the conce of this section equatore, happening, as it did, so soon after the explosion on the river, and he has with at it was explosion to burry forward on the trail of the savages, so as to strike them on the rear during the darkness.

His companions appreciated the necessity of haste, and were exerte overtake the for. A brief examination does the manufaction does the manufaction of the their compact of the form of the property of the form would crabbell and one or manifold their of examples of the form.

Although the right was acted from was pain each in to such woodsner as Kent in a cell adact, who ad the party forward recipy it a run, so need every achening their speed to make succeived that may were on the right track. After keeping up tais pale in he ir or so, they stepped for the purpose of examining the ground carefully, in order to determine whether S to Ar her and Stephen Albyne were still with the Indians. A packled to the purpose than to identify his track, and the girds heeled shoes would be easily track. They says found S is an's track, the ground where they had staged heids soft and nearly designed alleves; but they could first rothing to convince them that Alleyne was ahead of them.

They were the at the press forward, when they were started a ride, at a short distance from where they were standing.

"Can it but well that we have come upon them already?" asked Kenton.

"State ly," replied Hardnett. "If that wasn't Red Hawk's ride, I will all at that I may be decived in the voice of a gan that I organ to know. But we must be careful. Stay here a little, buys, while I go on and see what the matter is."

The score disarpered, and in a few monerals his companions heard a joynal "who up?" which told them that he had found friends.

They may from the same of his voice, and for his and regions of his voice, and his is an all his tall trees. At his is an all him and region of his separate that a separate the his and hear him by an immense dead panther.

the little Delicated was only able to tell what he had been and how.

H. ! - i I the manner in which Alleyne had effected his escape, and pointed out the course that he had taken for the purpose of striking the trad of the Shawnees. He and Stephen had stopped, he said, on hearing the sound of voices, and he had seen the panther spring from the tree upon the white man who lay there. As quickly as possible he had taken aim and shot the punther, and had then tun up and disputemed the beast with his knife; but the white man was dead, or nearly so. He had noticed the girl as he ran up, and he did not know how she and the white man had happened to be there.

It is that miscrable sneak who brought the boats ashore," said Hardnett, as he examined the body of the white man.

"Yes," sail But Archer, "it is Amos Darnel."

There was yet a taint spark of life in Damel's body; but be was insens ble, and the spark soon went out.

"It must have been a judgment on him," remarked Buck Hardnett, "and I reckon it is for the best that it happened so. I wouldn't have liked to had the killing of such a skunk."

Sue Archer had revived, and the attention of all was directed to her, as all were anxious to hear how she had escaped from the Indians.

At first she seemed unable to speak, and a tall backwoo'sman produced a "tickler" from the breast of his hundingshart, suggesting that a taste of spirits would loosen her tongue. It had the desired effect, and she began her story, addressing herself to Stephen Alleyne:

"After Amos Darnel set you free-" she commenced.

"After what?" interrupted Stephen. "Amos Durnel never thought of setting me free."

There was so much surprise on both sides, that mutual explanations were necessary, and Sasan learned the full extent of Amos Darnel's perfidy.

"The wreten!" she exclaimed, with a glance at his corpse. "But he has paid for that, and he is beyond abuse now."

As she proceeded with her narrative, it became necessary to explain matters to Stephen Alleyne and the Delaware, who had not yet been able to account to the loud report and the great light on the river. When Red Hawk comprehended what had happened, he held out his hand to But Archer and told him that he was a great warrior.

Susan related how stupefied the Indians had become after that occurrence, how they had set out to return to their town, and how, upon the death of a warrior on the route, they had set her and Amos Darnel free, telling them to go where they pleased. She did not omit to mention that the savages had been so overcome by superstitious fear that they had abandoned all their plunder.

For Amos Darnel there was a universal sentiment of execration; but it was agreed that it would be better to bury his body, than to leave it to the wolves and the crows.

This done, Bat Archer and another young man were directed to hasten back to the barge, to inform Mrs. Archer and Margaret Alleyne of what had transpired, and the others went up the trail to look for the plunder that had been abandoned by the Indians. They found it ready packed, and selected such of the most valuable articles as they could carry. Loaded with these, they made their way back to the river at the place where they had left their boats.

The barge was brought to the bank, for the purpose of more easily loading the men and the plunder, and Sue Archer and Stephen Alleyne were restored to their rejoicing friends. Kenton and his companions were then, according to their request, landed on the other shore, as they wished to return to their homes, and the others pursued their way in the barge to their destination, which they reached in safety.

Stephen Alleyne had already secured a location, and he and Bat Archer at once set at work to erect a cabin. As soon as it was finished, the former was married to Sue Archer, having persuaded her that the ceremony ought to be performed before she should be again captured by Indians.

Bat Archer and his mother lived with Stephen Alleyne, at whose house none, were ever so welcome as Red Hawk and Buck Hardnett, the latter of whom was so well pleased with the location that he settled in the vicinity.

It was generally supposed that the stout scout would be pleased with any neighborhood that held Margaret Alleyne, and Margaret was more than once known to blush when such an insinuation was made in her hearing.

The state of the same of the s Francisco de la companya del la companya de la companya del la companya de la com THE PERSON AND ASSESSED TO THE PERSON OF THE PERSON OF THE PERSON NAMED IN THE PERSON A STATE OF THE LONG THE PARTY OF THE PARTY O THE PARTY OF THE PARTY OF THE PARTY OF THE PARTY OF THE PARTY. AND THE PARTY OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY O the second secon The first of the second THE THE DRIVE DELLE STATE STATE OF THE WAY AS THE WAY AS THE THE PARTY OF THE PARTY HE SHE WAS A SHE AND THE RESIDENCE OF THE PARTY STELL STATE OF THE STATE OF THE PROPERTY OF TH CERTIFIC CONTRACTOR OF THE PROPERTY OF LONGINGS OF LONGINGS OF LONGINGS. THE THE RESIDENCE OF THE PROPERTY AND ADDRESS OF THE PROPERTY AND ADDRESS. Control of the Control of the Security of the Partie Parti The state of the s THE STATE OF THE PROPERTY OF THE STATE OF THE PARTY OF TH 是我们是我们是我们是我们的人,我们就没有一个人,我们们的人,我们们的人,我们们的人,我们们的一个人,我们们的一个人,我们们的一个人,我们们的一个人们的一个人们的

Beadle's Dime Song Book Series, No. 29.

For sale by all newsdealers; or sent, post-paid, to any address on re-

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers,

98 William Street. New York.

Beadle's Standard Dime Publications,

BEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

Bach volume 100 12mo, pages. Sent postage-paid, on receipt of price, ten cents each.

Dime Novels. 1. Maineska. 9. The Privateer's Cruise. 3. Myra. 4. Alice Wilde. 5. The Golden Beit. 6. Chip, the Cave Child. 7. The Reafer of 76. 8. Soth Jones. 9. The Slave Sculptor. 10. The Backwoods Bride. Il. Prisoner La Vintresse. 12. Bill Biddon, Tcapper. 13. Cedar Swamp. 14. Emerald Necklace. 15. The Frontier Angel. 16. Uncle Ezekiel. 17. Madge Wylde. 18. Nat Todd. 19. Massasoit's Daughter. 20, Elorida. 21. Sybil Chase. 42. The Maid of Esopus. 23. Winifred Wintbrop. 24. The Trail Honters. 25. The Peon Prince. 76. Brathren of the Coast. 27. Daughter of Liberty. 28. King Baruaby. 29. The Forest Spy. 30. Put. Pomfret's Ward. 31. The Double Hero. 39. Irona. 33. Manu Guinea. 34. Ruth Margerie. 35. East and West. 36. Rithmen of the Miami. 37. Godbold, the Spy. 35. The Wrong Man. The Land Claim. Unioniat's Daughter. 41. The Hunter's Cabin. 42. The King's Man. 43. The Allens. 44. Agnes Falkland. 45. Esther. 46. Wreck of the Albion. 47. Tim Bulable's Charge. 121. Vailed Beneinctress. 48. Oonomeo, the Haron. 49. The Gold Hunters. 50. The Black Ship. 51. The Two Grands. 59. Single Eye. 58. Hates and Loves. 54. Myrtle. 55. Off and On. 56. Ahmo's Plot 57. The Scout. 56. The Mad Hunter. 59. Kent, the Ranger. 60. Jo Daviess' Client, 61. Laughing Eyes 84. The Unknown 63. The Indian Princess. 64. Rangers of Mohawk.

65. The Wracker's Prize.

56. The Hunter's Voy.

70. The Indian Queen.

72. The Moose Hunter,

67. Indian Jim.

69. The Brigantine.

89. Black Hollow.

71. The Lost Trail.

76. The Scout's Prize. 77. Quindaro. 78. The Rival Scouts. 79. Seinglittli Rangers. 80. Eagle Eve. St. The Two Houters. 22. The Mystir Canne. 83, The Golden Harpoon, 64. The Seminore Chief. 85. The Fugitives 86. Red Plume. 87. On the Deep. 88. Captain Molly. 89. Star Eyes. 90. Cast Away. 91. The Lost Cache. 90. The Twin Scouts. Mr. The Creole Sistem. 21. The Mad Skipper. 95, Eph Peters. 96. Little Morensin. 97. The Decemed Flunter. 98. Ruth Harland. 99. Overboard. 100, Enralbo. 191. Maid of Wyoming. 102. Hearts Forever. 109. Bly Foot, the Guide. 104. Guilty or Not Guilty. 105, The Man in Green. 106. Simple Phil. 107. The Peddler Spy. 108. The Lost Ship. 108. Kidnapped. 110. The Hubien Home. III. The Shawnes' Foe. 112, The Falcon Rover. 113. Ruttlepute. 114. Ned Starling. 115, The Sons of Liberty. ; 116. Port at Last. 1117. The Mohegran Maiden. 1116, The Water Walf. 119. The Five Champions. 190. The Hunchback. 122. Barden, the Ranger. 123. The Missing Britis. 124. Sumter's Scouts. 125, The Hunted Life. 126, Old Jupe. 127. Bald Engle. The Gulch Minera 1129. Blackeyes. 180. Brave Heart. 131. Wrecker's Daughter. 132. Old Honesty. 133. Yankee Eph. 134. Foul-weather Jack. 135. The Cherokee Chief. 136. The indian-Hunters. 187. The Traiter Spy. 138. Tim, the Scout, 139. The Border Fous. 140. Sheet-Anchor Tom. 141. The Helpiess Hand. 142. The Sagamere of Saco. 216. Red Rel. 148. The Swamp Scout, 154. The Prairie Trappers. 918, Indian Spy. 145. The Mountaineer. 146. Border Bessie. 147. Maid of the Mountain, 221. The Blue Clipper.

74. Craiser of Chesapenke: 148. Ontward Hound. 75. The Hunter's Escape. 149. The Hunter's Pledge. 150. The Scalp-Hunters.* 151. The Two Trails. 152. The Planter Pirate. 153. Mohawk Nat-154. R b Ruskin. 156. The White Squaw." 136. The Quakerena Spr. 157. The Indian Avenuer. 168, The Blue Anchor. 139. Samw bird. Jon. The Swamp Rifles. 161. The Lake Rangers. 102. The Border Rivals. 163, Job Denn, Trapper. 184. The Giant Chief. 165. The Unseen Hand. 166. Red-Skin's Pledge. 167. Shadow Jack. 168, The Silent Hunter. 169. The White Canor. 170. The Border Avengers. 171. The Silent Slaver. 172. Beapard, the Spr. 173, The Red Coyote. 174. Queen of the Woods. 175, The Prairie Rifles. 176. The Trader Spy. 177. The Pale-face Squaw 179. The Prairie Marie 179. The White Vulture. 180. Giant Pete, Putrion. 181. Old Kyle, the Trailer. 182 Inbez Hawk. 183, The Phantom Ship. 184 The Red Rider. 185. The Dacotab Scourre 186. The Red Scalper. 187. The Cartlaws' Plat. 188, The Black Rover. 189. The Yellow Chief. 120. Phantam Haragman. 197. Red Slayer. 199. The Specter Skipper. 193. The Swamp Ridge. 104. Graylock, the Guide. 196. The First Trail, 196. Eagle Planer. 197, Shawner Scout-108. Burt Bunker. 199. Red Ontlaw. 200. Prairie Pathinder. 201. White Sequent 502 Phastom Foe.

231. The Texan Trailer. 13. The Prairie Queen. 233. The Privatoer's Bride. 2 4. The Forest Specier. 235. The Black Wigard. 236, The Re Fleud. 237. The Plymouth Scott 228. Night-Flawk Kit. Dime School Scries. L American Speaker. 2. National Spraker. 3. Patriotic Spraker. 4 Comic Speaker. A. Elecutionist. 5. Humoreus Speaker. 7. Standard Speaker. 6. Stannp Speaker. 9. Juvenile Speaker. 10. Spread-Engle Speaker. D. Dime Debuter. 12. Exhibition Spenker. DIRLOGUES, Nov. 1 to 10. Melmillar. School Malodist. 2007 Monked Guide. 205. The Gray Scalp. 206, Buckskip Bill. 507. The fuffale Trapper. 20%, The Ocean Outlaw. 200. Scarred Eagle. 210, Redlaw, Hall-Breed. 213. The Quadroon Spy. 213, Squatter Dick. 214. The Ferrest Monster. 215. The White Hermit. 217. Mountain Gid, 212. The Schoto Scombs, 220. Nick Doyle.

Dime Band-Books. 1. Layley- It rites. 2. But of Etiquette. S. Book of Verses. 4. Book of Drawning. 5. Fortune-Teller, in Ludies' Lawer- Writer. T. Lovers' Casket. 8. Rollinson Crass 9. Bu l-room Companien. li one of buy, Nos. I tail. Dime Game-Rocks. Bane-Ball Player for 1871. Bend at Croquet. Chem Instructor. Dime Family Series. I. Cook Book. 2: Recipe Book. Z. Housewife's Manual. 4. Family Physician. Dressmaking, Millinery. Dime Song Books. Sung Books, Nos. I to 22. Dime Biographics. 1 Guritalel 9. Daniel Borne. Kit Carson. 4. Anthony Wayne, David Crockett, 6. Winfield Scott, L. Pontley. E. John C. Fremont. 2. John Poul Jones. 10. Marquie de Lainvette, 11. Tucon seb. 12. George B. McClellan Ill. Parson Brownlow. 14. Abraham Lincoln. 15. Ulyases S. Gragt. For sale by all Newsdealers ; or sent, Post-PAID, to may minima, on receipt of price, TEN CENTS EACH.

222. The Mad Ranger.

20%. Mustang-Hanters.

The Mute Cirket.

225. Black Army.

223. King of the Mountal.

227. The Forest Princess.

929. The Wille Grindy.

900. The Purlisan Spy.

CM. The Mohave Captive.

78. The Silver Bugis. " Novels marked with a star are double numbers, 900 pages. Price 20 cents.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.

204. Metamora.

212. Silverspur.